3 Yea, the sparrow hath found a house, and the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young, even thine altars, O Lord of hosts, my King, and my God.

4 Blessed are they that dwell in thy house: they will be still praising thee.

One can read this Psalm and hear silent church bells ring. A walk to the house of God brings the soul that much nearer heaven. This Psalm must be read with the twentieth and ninety-second. One's love for the church, its sacraments and services, its songs and sermons, is a sure index of the inner spiritual life. The Gate of Pearl will swing wide for the saved sinner who can say verse ten in real truth.

Christ's Teaching on Trust*

What the Sermon on the Mount Does and Does Not Enjoin

FEW passages have been more frequently misunderstood than the one associated with the Topic. It is not by one sermon or one expression that we can get the spirit of any one's teaching. Least of all that of Christ. Taking, then, a general view, we find that Christ did not condemn the acquisition of money, nor the forethought that would lead a man to make provision for illness or old age, or for the support of his widow and family if he died before reaching old age. What he did condemn was that lust for wealth which would sacrifice principle or character to it. He condemned, too, that wearing anxiety and foreboding which destroys the peace of many and monopolizes their thoughts. He condemned, too, the principle of hoarding which paralyzes charity and turns money into an idol. In short, Christ's principle is that money-getting and keeping shall occupy a subordinate place in the lives of his followers. He wished them to make their spiritual interests the first and supreme concern. In all his dealing with men, he fixed his attention on character. Whether a man had little money or was rich did not concern him, but what he was, not what he had. It is unlikely that he would have told the rich young man to go sell all he had and give to the poor (Matt. 19: 21) if the young man had not challenged him to point to any imperfection in his character. With unerring finger, Christ touched his weakness and showed him that he loved his wealth more than treasure in heaven. He does this still. A rich man may enter heaven, as a poor man may, but neither of them because of his wealth or his poverty. The poor man who would sacrifice Christian principle to keep his position, or to make a few dollars in his extreme need, is just as much disobedient to this teaching of Christ as is the rich man who is deaf to the claims of charity.

*Topic of The Christian Endeavor Society and Baptist Young People's Union for March 15. Matt. 6: 19-34.

The Christian's Pleasures†

A Rule which may be Applied to Amusements called Innocent

EVEN the early Corinthian church was perplexed about the problem that disturbs us in the present day. Its terms have changed, but its principles are identical. We are not now troubled about whether we may eat food that has been consecrated to idols. All that dispute has gone to limbo with the idols; but we have still to consider what effect our conduct will have on others. The man who was shocked at the sight of the broad-minded Christian eating food forbidden by the Mosaic law, is still among us though he has turned his attention to other subjects. He must be taken into account by all who would obey the Apostle's teaching. We must not be content with proving that an amusement is innocent; we must also assure ourselves that it is harmless alike to ourselves and others. It would be difficult, for example, to prove that shuffling a few pieces of pasteboard according to rule is wrong; but when we find that card-playing exercises a fatal fascination over some minds, we see where the Apostle's principle applies. The boy who has been accustomed to see his father sit down and play a game of whist after the toil of the day and knows that no harm ever came of it, may have in him the gambler's spirit, which, under different environment, may bring him to ruin. So with the intoxicating cup. So with the theatre. The Christian who carefully selects the plays he will see, who sees only those that are elevating and wholesome, nevertheless, is marked as a theatre-goer, and his example is quoted in justification by others, who prefer the most pernicious plays. Other amusements and recreations come under the same rule. If they are liable to lead a weaker brother into harm; if the example set, may be followed by others to their undoing, we have no right to indulge in them. Cain's question, "Am I my brother's keeper?" ought to have no place on Christian lips. We are our brother's keeper, to the extent that we are bound to do nothing which will tend to his harm.

AN HISTORIC RIOT

The Disturbance in Ephesus a Question of Money

By Mrs. M. Baxter

AFTER a personal blessing a time of proving almost always follows. All the Lord's gold must pass through the fire. It is the same with blessing in our service. When a great work of God is done in any place, some severe time of testing follows. The enemy of God and man comes in with his tares to caricature the real life of God which is in the hearts of men through the indwelling of the Holy Spirit. If he cannot succeed in one way he tries another; and when the children of God are the most true, then he introduces persecution; it was so at Ephesus during Paul's residence in that city. Paul had already received intimations from above that his work at Ephesus was drawing to a close. Having with him, from the band of young men whom he seems to have trained for the ministry, Timothy and Erastus, he sent them into Macedonia, while he remained a little longer at Ephesus. And now persecution broke out. Previously it had been the Jews who had stirred up persecution against Paul. Now it was the heathen, not on account of their religion, but their commerce; it was a matter of money.

A religion that pays well must not be interfered with; to do away with it would throw thousands out of work. We cannot afford to have a religion which controls our consciences and interferes with our gains. Such was the argument of the men of business in Ephesus, who gloried in their idolatry. But such is also the argument of men of the world in our day. Musical services? Yes, they minister to our æsthetic tastes—they are all right, a cathedral anthem is as good as a concert. Intellectual preaching? Yes, we like to hear eloquence in the pulpit; it is almost as good as some of the finest political speeches—this suits us well, it ministers to us. But all this fine talk about the claims of God, about conscience, about heaven and hell, about judgment to come—all these things are useful to keep in check those who might be dangerous without such ideas, but they are not for intellectually enlightened people. Such are the ideas of a vast majority in our so-called Christian lands. All for us; nothing for God. Only a religion which panders to our tastes, and is good for our trade; but any religion which claims to master our conscience and regulate our life, we will have none of it. And yet these very men must every one of them give an account of themselves to God; and they must be judged in the last day by the rejected words which Christ has spoken (John 12: 28).

"Ye know that by this craft we have our wealth," said Demetrius. There is a certain consistency in an idolater making a god which suits his purpose, so that he can make a good thing for his business out of his religion. But what must be the sin in the sight of God of that man who wants to make his professed service of the God who made him to minister to his business? What must it be in the sight of God himself? How must the angels of God look upon it? What can the heathen think of it, when a follower of the God who made the worlds, and who gave his only begotten Son to live in our flesh and die for his salvation, treats that God as the heathen treats his image? That such thing can be possible goes to prove that "there is no difference" between the unregenerate heart of the idol worshipper and the unregenerate heart of the nominally Christian unbeliever. With him, too, business and self-interest are first, and his God is second. Both, nominal Christian and heathen, will have to give in an account of what they have done with the lives with which God has intrusted them; and they will be judged, not according to ideas of man which suited them, but according to the Word of the living God concerning them.

The appeal of Demetrius was not without its effect. The indignation meeting of the great idol-making industry was "full of wrath, and they raised the cry: Great is Diana of the Ephesians." The excitement rose to such a pitch that the whole city was in confusion; and laying hold of Gaius and Aristarchus, two of Paul's traveling companions, men of Macedonia, they rushed into the theatre.

R & G

NEW MODEL

R & G

IS PRESENTED AS THE LEADING STYLE FOR 1903

It is a straight front, moderately low bust, moderately deep-hip corset. Of correct and artistic lines, in full accord with the present vogue, but without the outré eccentricity of the more pronounced models.

It is designed not alone for snappy style and real beauty, but for comfort and wear—two distinct R & G characteristics—and it will, we believe, meet the requirements of a greater number of stylish women than any other corset. We expect it to be the most popular corset of the year.

"837" is sold by dealers everywhere at $1.50. Other models, including the extremely low-bust, deep-hip styles, the Empire and other specialties, are sold at prices ranging from $1 to $10.00.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

G. A. R., Glassboro, N. J. In what sense was Paul debtor to the Greeks and to the Barbarians, as he declares himself to be in Rom. 1: 14?

He uses the word in the sense of obligation. Being the Apostle to the Gentiles he was bound (constrained as he says in another place) to take the Gospel to both the cultured and the ignorant peoples. Having accepted service under Christ, the whole world had a claim on him which he could not discharge until he had preached the Gospel to the full extent of his power. A second meaning may attach to his words in the sense of his having won souls among both the Greeks and the Barbarians. He was debtor to both, in the sense that he had gained fruit from them, as he says in the previous verse,—the fruit he desired above all, of converts for Christ. The souls he won were his crown.

I. T. M., Cascade Valley, N. Y. Please describe the regalia of England.

The Crown Regalia of Great Britain is a very extensive collection. It includes the imperial crown, worn by Victoria and later by Edward; the old imperial crown (made for Charles II.), the Prince of Wales' crown, the Queen's diadem, the Queen Consort's crown, the imperial orb or emblem of sovereignty, the Queen's orb, the temporal sceptre, spiritual sceptre, three other sceptres, St. Edward's staff, the Queen's ivory sceptre, the ampulla (a vessel for oil), anointing spoon, spurs, armilla (or bracelets), sword of mercy, sword of state, sword of justice, a gold and ruby ring, baptismal font of silver, golden salt-cellars, and a variety of minor articles.

J. W. S., Danbury, Conn. I am a lifelong Methodist, but am concerned about the present condition of the church. How is it there are now so few revivals? Is it too much to hope for a Pentecostal outpouring?

The questions you ask are, as you may have seen, perplexing the bishops and leaders of your church. There are probably many reasons for the rarity of revivals. One of them is the present era of prosperity in business. It has been noticed that some financial panic or some other calamity usually accompanies or precedes a revival. Men's thoughts are turned from this world to the other by loss and suffering. A second reason is probably to be found in the change in the character of preaching. The old time style, appealing to the fears and emotions, was more likely to produce strong desire after salvation than the present style, which appeals rather to the intellect. A third cause may be the worldliness of church members. Young people, and people outside the church are liable to come to the conclusion that a religion which makes so little change in the life as that professed by some church members, is not worth having.

E. L. M., Rex, Mich. Is it right for a preacher to uphold the prize matches, or to pay in money toward buying gloves for boxing?

While we believe a man may be both an athlete and a Christian, it is a degrading and brutalizing thing for a pastor to preach or teach the gospel in any form. Such was not the spirit of Christ. Boxing preachers might do very well as instructors in a gymnasium, but they are sadly out of place in the church. We should doubt the sanity of any preacher who punctuated his pious admonitions with pugilistic advices, and who could, with equal ability, instruct the young in holy living and head punching.

O. C., Bellerville, Ill. Suppose a person has two houses, both in the house and burglars break in and steal the books. Would it be wrong to say to them that you had no money? Or that you had only one confession of religion to be considered his views publicly before his death?

1. The same question, in a different form, has been widely discussed. Ans. "Is a lie ever justifiable?" In the strict spiritual sense, it is not. A person who "trusts in God, and does the right," God will not forsake those who put their trust in Him. Worldly wisdom allows "the lie of expediency or emergency." It is only those who have faith who refuse to yield to such temptations, or to show weakness in moments of trial. 2. He never did, as far as we have heard.

H. C. H., Houghton, N. Y. What States have abolished capital punishment? Has crime increased or diminished?

In Rhode Island, Maine, Michigan and Wisconsin the death penalty is forbidden by statute. It was abolished in Iowa in 1872, and restored in 1878; it was also abolished in Colorado, but restored in 1901.

E. L., Oakland, Calif. 1. What is meant by the first and second resurrections? 2. Does the word Lord in the New Testament apply to the Father or to Christ? 3. In professing religion and joining a church, is our guilt removed or are other requirements essential?

1. You will see by I. Thess. 4: 14, that there will be a resurrection of those who have trusted in Christ antedating that of all others. John says (Rev. 20: 5) that the whole length of the millennium intervenes. 2. You can easily see by the context to whom it refers.

WINTER IN THE NORTHWESTERN WOODS

This is a photographic view of the famous "Bridal Veil Bluff" on the Columbia River, Oregon

The disciples addressed Jesus as Lord, and in prayer, no doubt, addressed the Father as Lord. 3. Other things are essential. Any minister can tell you what they are. Joining the church, in most cases, implies that having forsaken sin and trusted in Christ for salvation, you publicly unite with the Lord's people and confess him before men. It does not imply perfection, but it does imply identification with Christ and an obligation to follow and obey him.

Reader, Yonkers, N. Y. (1) Why, if God is almighty, does he not save all the human race? (2) Does the soul go immediately to heaven at death, as we may infer from Luke 23: 43, or not until the resurrection, as appears to be taught in I. Thess. 4: 16?

(1) It is contrary to God's method of dealing with the human race, as we understand it, for him to use compulsion with men. Apparently, his desire is to have a people who, being left free to choose, voluntarily choose righteousness. He draws them, he yearns over them, applies discipline, offers them his help, but beyond this he will not go in this life. You see, a man who is good only because he is compelled to be good, is of a much lower type than he who, being free to become evil, seeks of his own accord to become good. It is this higher type that, as we believe, God is trying to produce. (2) The two passages you quote do not contradict one another. That in Luke promises the thief that he would be in Paradise, by which the Jews understood the abode of the blessed dead, and that in Thessalonians that Christ would bring the Christian dead with him at his return to earth. If he brings them with him, we must suppose that they have been with him before his coming. There is no direct statement in the Bible on the subject, but there are several from which it is fair to infer that those who have died in Christ are with him in glory.

C. C. B., Liberty, Miss. Kindly impress the Finns with the fact that the southern part of the U. S. contains vast acres of unoccupied and fertile land, congenial climate and people, who would gladly have them come among them.

These facts, so kindly expressed, are already well known to the Finns. Great numbers of them are now emigrating to this country.

Reader, Hoboken, N. J. What is the origin of the custom of raising a bush over a new building when the framework is complete?

Various explanations have been given, but the most probable is that it is a variant of the custom formerly common of displaying a bush of ivy over a new hotel. Ivy was symbolical of the heathen deity, Bacchus, and the display of it was intended to indicate that there was within the means for jollity and festivity. The display of the bush on a new house came to be regarded as a sign of thankfulness that the work was so far complete, and that the workers were being regaled at a celebration. The explanation seems far-fetched, but it is the only one we have seen that has the elements of probability in it. Perhaps some of our readers have heard a better explanation.

Mrs. S. A., Tola, Kan. Should a woman give according to her means for the cause of Christ if her husband is strictly against her giving anything?

Man or woman, the first duty is to God and conscience. Neither a husband nor a wife has the moral right to prevent the exercise of this duty. There may, however, be a legal question involved in some cases which this answer does not affect. Generally speaking, the wife does right to give according to her means. It should be remembered, however, that giving to the church, where it involves robbing the grocer, the butcher, or the baker of what one owes them, is not Christian giving, but its counterfeit.

New Subscriber, E. Dayton, Mich. Would it be right, in the sight of God, for a young man, who has led a wicked life, but has been converted and is now a Christian, to try and win the love of a good, pure girl?

It is a great risk for the young woman to assume; but if the man has been truly converted, and is leading an honorable and upright life, there is no bar to such a union. Such unions are far from being admirable, however, though there are plentiful enough. Judged in the strictest sense, it would seem that the man who has lived a vicious life is not justified in seeking to win the love of a pure, young girl. To make a pretence of worthiness in order to gain her affection would be hypocrisy. She ought to know something of the career of the man to whom she is asked to bind herself, and if, knowing this, she loves him notwithstanding, then she accepts the responsibility.

M. L. A., Pembrina, N. D. In what way can it be shown that Jesus was the son of David? The genealogies show the descent of Joseph, but do not say to what tribe or family Mary belonged, and it is from her, not from Joseph, according to orthodox theology, that Jesus derived his humanity.

The theory has been propounded and supported by Weiss and other scholars that the genealogy of Luke is that of Mary. You will notice that Luke says (3: 23) that Joseph was the son of Heli, whereas Matthew says (1: 16) that he was the son of Jacob. If we suppose that Luke's statement should read, "who was the son-in-law of Heli," that is, married the daughter of Heli, the difficulty is removed; for as you may have noticed, the genealogies differ. Luke traces the descent through David's son Nathan, while Matthew traces it through Solomon. Even that explanation, however, has its incongruities, of which there is no clear explanation. The fact that Mary before her marriage went to Bethlehem to be taxed or registered (Luke 2: 5), would indicate that she was of David's house. It is noteworthy, too, that Christ's claims to Messiahship were never challenged on that ground. If there had been any flaw in his pedigree, the Jews would have seized upon it without a doubt, because the prophecies clearly stated that Messiah would be descended from David.

A. O. R., Minneapolis, Minn. What is the origin of having towers on the churches?

As a feature of sacred architecture, towers are of very ancient origin. The Temple in Jerusalem was supplied with numerous towers. First of all, it seems, towers standing alone and not as a part of any building, were used for purposes of observation, refuge and defence. They were often established as outposts, for the protection of commerce, of wells, flocks and herds. Built in vineyards, they served a double end, for the keepers might dwell therein. Mural towers, at the corners of walls and gates, were part of the fortifications of towns. What more natural than that the tower should come to be an attachment of the principal buildings of a city, such as the king's palace, and the temple of worship? From such heights, not only could watch be kept, but proclamations made; trumpets could be sounded, calling to war or worship. Symbolically, as a place for protection or defence, the tower was a fitting adjunct to the House of God. In mediæval times, fully as much as before Christ, towers were in request for the same ends. By reason of its architectural dignity and beauty, because of convenience as belfry and observatory, and by reason of its symbolism, the tower has been retained to the present day as a characteristic of sacred buildings, the spires "pointing heavenward," being modifications of the old watch-towers of Palestine.

C. A. W., Kerr, Mo. It is pronounced "Senshee."

Subscriber, Hammond, Wis. 1. Foolscap size. 2. We never heard of it.

M. D., Schuylkill, Pa. If you mean whether God would forgive such a sin on repentance, we say, yes, assuredly. There are many promises encouraging such an one to repent. If you mean can there be repentance, we say there can, and probably there will, but it may be remorse rather than repentance, and that does not avail. As to your second question, there is a difference of opinion among ecclesiastics and scholars. Our own opinion, based on I. Cor. 7: 15 and other passages, is that he is justified. PHILADELPHIA'S FLOATING ENDEAVORERS

THE river front of Philadelphia is a rough district, abounding in low dives, and full of pitfalls for the sailor. He returns from a hard, perilous voyage, to be beset by greedy scoundrels of l sorts. Unless some outside hand is stretched to aid im, it is small odds but he will sink in the mire. Recog- zing this condition, a body of Christian Endeavorers rganized to look out especially for the sailors, and, so far as possible, to show them a better way of life than the traditional "Jack ashore" dissipation. In the course of their work these earnest men and women patrol the river front, seek out newly-arrived vessels, board them in all weathers, and at almost all hours, and make a personal appeal to the seamen.

UP THE SHIP'S SIDE WITH AN ORGAN

The entire river front is patrolled by these brave Floating Endeavorers. The Northeast Branch cares for the five mile stretch of wharves from Poplar street to Tacony; the Delaware Branch from Poplar street to Market street, and the South Branch from Market street to Point Breeze; throwing out the lifeline to save some of the thousands of sailors at visit the port, from the land-sharks that lie in wait lure their victims into the low saloons as soon as they nd with a little money.

One hundred and fifty societies of these branches take rns in holding meetings on the wharves, or on nearby ssels. Every Sunday morning, as early as six or ven o'clock, bands of young people start out from the mes of the chairmen of these branches, with literare that is appropriate to the work. They hold five eetings in the morning, and as many more in the ternoon. But successful work means far more than lding meetings in a perfunctory way; it means apying Paul's "all things to all men," to the winning of ck's confidence and love.

uring the past six months, the Richmond and Kenington districts, 4,384 vessels ere visited, 39,000 papers id magazines were distribed, and 149 meetings held.

Mr. Simonson, of the Seaen's Mission, is an enthuastic Endeavorer, and has orked for eleven years mong his brother sailors. lmost any day he may be en diving into their boardg-houses and dens, and ambering aboard ships in arch of the men that need m. In his mission he has ail boxes, in which the en's letters are kept for em. In these may be seen roll of queer names, almost hausting the nationalities the earth.

At the Mariner's Bethel an ndeavor meeting is held ery Wednesday evening, ter which coffee and cake e served. Sometimes fifty en are in attendance. A easant reading-room is atched to the church for the ilors. As a result of this ıtiring attention and the siting of ships, boardingouses and other seamen's sorts, over 8,000 sailors have been gladdened during e past year by this bit of home care, and have been ought in direct touch with the great love of God.

The "Life Line League," of Point Breeze, is a band of thusiastic workers, of over 100 members. Here is where the vessels of the great Atlantic Refining Company come. A visit to one of the cook-houses can never be forgotten. They are the rendezvous of the sailors in winter. A reading-room was opened two years ago, and over 3,200 sailors, tug boatmen, conductors and motormen have visited the room and spent pleasant evenings. The League furnishes all writing materials free. In the different meetings held, hundreds of sailors and others have held up their hands for prayer; letters have been received from captains, officers and men from the forecastle, in all parts of the world, telling how they have been helped in the Christian life, how meetings have been started on board their ships, and some captains have said "they did not lose a man or have a drunken man on board while they remained at Point Breeze."

Some of the Endeavorers have walked a distance of three miles every Sunday to reach Greenwich Point, the most isolated spot along the river front, but a very busy port at certain seasons of the year. The workers are cheered by the echoes of their efforts. They recently learned that a German captain followed up their visit to his vessel by holding religious services regularly every Sunday, and also during the week, and that he was encouraged to continue this course by the marked improvement in the conduct of all the crew.

More than one hundred thousand sailors in the port of Philadelphia are helped every year to greater or less extent by the city's Christian Endeavor Floating Societies.

Thomas Stuart has missed but one Sunday morning during the five years he has been chairman of the Northeast Branch Floating work in visiting the sailors. He invites them to his home, and wins their confidence by kindness and love. He has received letters from sailors in all parts of the world, telling in warm terms how they were helped and guided to a new life, and of the treatment and kindness shown them by the Philadelphia Floating Endeavorers. The following is an extract from such a letter from Cornwall, England:

I am writing to thank you all for the great work you are doing on board the ships in Philadelphia. I have heard of it through my husband, Chief Engineer S. S. Mayfield. He tells me of your services, and of how all on board are impressed by them. He has evidently spent a most blessed time in your company and I write to express my gratitude to you all, who give your time to help those who so much need it. It is seldom that sailors are made to feel so much at home and welcome as you evidently have made my husband feel. He said he had never spent such a profitable time, and is filled with thanksgiving. You cannot imagine how full my heart feels toward you and your helpers. God bless you, and use you to help many to know his loving heart towards them. I join my prayers with yours and with truest gratitude.

Those who are reached are men of all nationalities, and of every conceivable degree of intelligence and education. They are for the most part acquainted with only the hard and brutal side of life. As is well known, they are subjected to conditions and treatment whose tendency is to obliterate the finer sensibilities and impulses of the human heart.

With such an atmosphere surrounding them from year to year, it is no wonder that the influences of home, and all religious training which they may have received in their youth, should almost slip away. Yet there is probably no class of men whose proper understanding of moral questions, and whose salvation is of greater importance to civilization than this class, for they man our vessels, carry our commerce, and are the means of communication with all civilized and uncivilized peoples of the world.

The Endeavor workers are chosen with great care, all of them looking into the conditions and surroundings of these men, and acquainting themselves with the duties and temptations of their lives. After each service, these workers mingle with the sailors and converse with them on the better subjects of life. It is quite usual for the seamen approached, to refer to this work as the first manifestation of real interest in their personal welfare. Some have been away from home for twenty-five or thirty years, and the influence of the home fireside has faded away. This mission work calls up the old memories. They hear the dear old hymns, and the familiar voices rising in prayer and in praise, and it leads them to high resolves and to a clearer, saner view of life.

OUR NATIONAL DEBT

TEXT—ROMANS 1: 14: "I am debtor both to the Greeks and to the Barbarians"

A NATIONAL debt! It is popularly understood to be a financial obligation which a government has pledged itself to pay. Sometimes this is contracted in the interest of a single subject. About thirty years ago, the English government assumed a debt of over $25,000,000 to liberate a single man, Captain Cameron, who had been unjustly endungeoned by the King of Abyssinia, in the rocky fortress of Magdala. It took six months for the news of the outrage to travel to England, but in less than eleven days afterward, a British army of fifteen thousand men, under General Napier, was on its way. It not only crossed the seas, but also marched a terrible journey of four hundred miles under a tropical sun, until the troops reached Magdala, and battered down the fortress, and rescued their incarcerated countryman. A civilized country is usually ready to begin any undertaking, assume any financial responsibility, in order to protect its own from the tyrannical clutches of a foreign foe.

Sometimes an extra financial obligation is assumed by a government in times of peace, as well as in times of war. A depleted treasury during the financial panic of 1893, caused the President of the United States to issue $200,000,000 worth of Government bonds. Some of these interest-bearing bonds were purchased by foreign capitalists, and others by American citizens. But there are still other forms and causes of international obligation. A government can owe to foreign lands more than money. Such definitions as we have given are right as far as they go; but they are too circumscribed. When the Hebrew, Paul wrote, "I am debtor both to the Greeks and to the Barbarians," I do not believe he had any idea of a financial interpretation. Referring to Greece, he was alluding to the intellectual influence of the Athenian capital, which made itself felt throughout the world. That city swayed the sceptre in the domain of intellectuality; it ruled the world of culture with the sculptor's chisel, the poet's pen, and the Demosthenean oratory of a patriot rousing the people to wage war against King Philip. When Paul spoke of the Barbarians, I believe he was alluding to the strength and the virility which the world had absorbed from the different provinces. As a man of learning he was indebted to those people to whom he was about to present Jesus Christ. So, to-day, I want to speak of America's national debt in a moral and spiritual sense, as well as in a financial. I want to show what we should give back to the lands across the seas, in return for what we have absorbed from them, consciously or unconsciously. As we balance our national books, the debit side of our ledger must be cleared off. If we are nationally honest, we are ready to pay for what we have received.

Indebted for Useful Men

Our country has been the reservoir for the best and the richest blood of all Europe. A few years ago, a noted Irish leader, now a member of the British Parliament, was addressing a great gathering of Irish-Americans in Chicago. During his speech, he made this suggestive statement: "You Irish-Americans congratulate yourselves, because every year you send over a few thousand dollars to help us in our struggle for Home Rule. But I want to tell you that you are doing no more than you ought to do. America owes a greater debt to Ireland than Ireland does to America. America has not taken from us money, but she has taken from us what is of more value than money. Her magnetism has come into our large cities, and villages, and factory towns, and wooed from our shores the best and strongest young men and young women we had. She has taken them away annually, not by the scores and hundreds, but by the thousands and the tens of thousands. She has taken away the strongest young men and women we had and has left only the weaklings—those who are afraid to start out in the new world. Meanwhile, we, the stay-at-homes, must go on struggling, while our stalwart Irish-American brothers and sisters are winning success in another hemisphere." What that member of the British Parliament said in reference to Ireland, can be said in reference to almost every country of Europe. Go down to the great seaport towns of Norway and Sweden, Germany, France, Italy, Holland, and England, and Scotland, and ask those emigrants, those stalwart young fellows, and those red-cheeked lassies where they are going. Everywhere you can hear the same answer, "To America. We are sailing for America."

Has America no obligation to meet, when she has taken from other lands such foreign-born leaders as Alexander Hamilton to run her finances, and Agassiz to read the records of her rocks, and Ericsson to save her navies, and John Summerville and John Hall to preach in her pulpits, and Andrew Carnegie to build her steel works, and John W. Mackay to develop her mines, and Thomas Moran to paint her pictures, and Dr. Nicholas Senn to stand at her operating tables, and Franz Sigel to fight her battles, and Speaker Henderson to preside over her Congress, and Thomas Watson to plead at her bar? Shall the Goddess of Liberty feel no indebtedness to foreign countries, when she has taken from their firesides their fairest daughters, and their bravest and truest young men, and clasped them to her own heart until these adopted sons and daughters look up and call her mother?

If we were to blot out from American history the deeds of its foreign-born children, we would obliterate many of the best pages of our national heroics. An old poem begins something like this:

> O give us men! A time like this demands
> Clean minds, pure hearts, true faith and ready hands;
> Men who possess opinions and a will;
> Men whom desire for office does not kill.

To supply this national demand, foreign countries have been giving us for centuries their best treasures. They have given us their sturdiest men of mental and moral worth, and their fairest daughters, whose virtues are, as King Solomon says, "above the price of rubies." Surely, for such priceless gifts, America must acknowledge she is a debtor "to the Greeks and to the Barbarians."

Indebted for Religious Liberty

Religious liberty's cradle also was built across the seas. True, it was floated across the Atlantic; and during its tempestuous voyage of many miles, its infantile occupant grew and waxed stronger. But after all, we should not forget that the cradle of civil and religious liberty was first hammered together on foreign shores.

In the astronomical world, we find that stars generally travel in constellations, or in groups. Thus, we also find that every great advancement of the human race, spiritually or mentally, socially or economically, is in touch with other events, though they may be seen or unseen. The sweet-voiced village church bell of today is not entirely of American manufacture. It was cast in the hot fires of the Covenanter's persecutions. It was cast among the flames which wrapped their fiery tongues about the shrivelling bodies of John Huss and Ridley, and Latimer and Cranmer. It was cast among the burning logs heaped about the dying body of Savonorola, when the Italian priest, Elijah-like, was about to go to heaven in a chariot of fire. It was cast, centuries back, among the Nerodian persecutions, in the days of the apostolic martyrdoms.

Can we ever reach the day when we shall feel that our religious liberty is not a natural outgrowth of the Christian heroes and heroines who dared to defy "Bloody" Alva, the persecutor of the Netherlands, or Lord Claverhouse, the persecutor of old Scotland, or demoniac Catharine, the fiendish female instigator of the St. Bartholomew Massacre, or the bloody Queen Mary, of the English throne? When that grand old man, Hugh Latimer, then over eighty, stood among the burning logs that were cremating him, he turned to Bishop Ridley, his fellow martyr near by, and said: "Be of good comfort, Master Ridley, and play the man. We shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace in England, as I trust shall never be put out." Aye, they did, they did. They not only lighted a Gospel torch for England, but a torch which would blaze in America centuries afterward. We have religious liberty in America, because the first great battles for the enchainment and the decapitation of satanic bigotry were fought upon the other side of the seas.

Gifts of Household Comfort

America is indebted to foreign lands in a commercial and an artistic sense, as well as in a moral and spiritual sense. Some political speakers love to boast, that commercially we are independent of the world. They assert, it would make very little difference to us whether or no foreign countries held any trade relations with us at all. But this is not true. You are a wealthy man. You invite me to your home, some night, to a banquet. I accept. As I sit waiting for the other guests to arrive, I say: "Mr. So and So, this is a beautifully designed home. Where did your architect get the idea?" You answer: "The plans of this house are not his ideas. He merely worked them out in detail, after I had described them. Some years ago, while I was in England, I came across a beautiful country home. I then said to myself, that if I should ever have money enough, I would buil a house upon that plan. This home is the result of m resolve, made at that time." Under my feet, is a rug c exquisite workmanship. Where was it made? In th city of Damascus. It is an imported rug. When you wife comes in to greet me, she is dressed in a beautif costume. It came from the silk-worms of France. Tha diamond, glittering upon your finger, was dug out c the African mines. That beautiful porcelain vase upo your mantel-piece, has a foreign name stamped upon i base. This beautiful table-cloth, which is spread i your dining-room, came from Belfast. Those gran pictures upon your walls, were painted by artists wh rose to be masters by studying in foreign schools, an sitting at the feet of the old masters of Europe.

Competition not Repayment

Up to a comparatively recent date our commerci dependence upon European markets for nearly all ou goods and chattels was almost absolute. In 1820, th Edinburgh Review of Scotland tauntingly asked, "Wh in the four quarters of the globe reads an American boo or goes to an American play, or looks at an America painting, or statue? What does the world owe t American physicians or surgeons? What new su stances have their chemists discovered? What ne constellations have their astronomers discovered? Wh drinks out of American glasses? Who eats fro American plates? Who wears an American coat, c lies down to sleep in an American blanket?" Foreig manufacturers of the present day know only too we that since 1820 the commercial dependency of Americ upon commercial Europe has mightily changed. B we are still dependent upon Europe in many ways. Fir sen, the Norwegian, reaches across the seas to lesse the horrors of smallpox. Charles H. Spurgeon an Joseph Parker sent their messages of the Christ-lov Queen Victoria gave us the example of how a roy Queen could be a domestic Queen. And the ship which ply the Atlantic still return with as heavy ca goes as when they left our shores.

How, then, is America to cancel the national debt, i a moral and spiritual sense, which she owes to th modern Greeks and to the Barbarians? "Well," a swers some one, "I suppose the best way to repay th debt we owe to foreign lands is to make our goods be ter and cheaper than they can make them, and then g forward and capture their markets for our home indu tries?" Ah, my brother, I am not here to fritter awa my time answering these selfish propositions prompte by mere commercialism. I am here to-day to tell yc how, in the language and the spirit of the Apostle Pau we are to cancel the national debt we owe to foreig lands. I am here to-day to tell you how best we c pay the debt, as individuals, as well as a nation. W can repay our national debt, first, by conveying to fo eign lands the sweet message of the Calvary Cros When, many years ago, five humble consecrated st dents met behind a haystack in old Williamstow where I used to go to college, and founded the fir American Foreign Missionary Society, one of th greatest purposes of America's future life was giv practical form. Those five young men planned evangelistic work, which had the same world-wide sco that Paul's mission had for the Christian religion. the religion of Jesus Christ is the beneficent thing th we profess to believe it, are we justified in keeping th knowledge of it to ourselves? Are we not bound debtors to the whole world to repay our obligations b making it known far and wide?

The Example of Physicians

The medical profession sets us an example in its pe formance of this duty. No sooner does a physician di cover a means of alleviating physical suffering than h places it at the disposal of his professional brethren, th world over. When Edward Jenner demonstrated th marvelous immunity of a human being who was vacc nated with cowpox, did he keep his discovery from th world? Did he refuse to advocate it lest he might b persecuted by such medical authorities as Dr. Inge housz and Dr. Pearson? Oh, no. As an intelligen man, he deplored the awful destruction made by th terrible scourge of smallpox. He knew that whol countries had been almost depopulated by the pes Mexico was not conquered so much by Cortes, as it wa made helpless by the invasion of this king of horrib plagues, called smallpox. When the Pilgrim Fathe landed upon the Massachusetts shores, they found th the Indian tribe which the year before had been inhal iting that part of the country, had been entirely obli erated, with the exception of one man, by the fat ravages of smallpox. So, in the face of derision, an persecution, Jenner proclaimed the gospel of vaccination. Though he might, and to a great extent did, destroy his private practice, he kept crying to suffering humanity, "Here is a remedy for this dreadful and malignant disease. Take it and live! Take it and live."

When James Y. Simpson perfected his investigations in chloroform, did he keep them to himself? Did he patent them, and say: "You come to me, or suffer and die?" No. He freely gave the anæsthetic to the world. And to-day, thousands upon thousands of men and women who have been compelled to lie upon an operating-table, have risen up to call him blessed. Is the German physician, Robert Koch, working in his laboratory for personal gain? Oh, no. He is trying, purely on philanthropic grounds, to cure consumption, which causes at least one-fourth of the total annual mortality among the human race. If he ever perfects a germicide for the tuberculosis bacilli, he will at once tell all he knows. He is struggling, and working, and analyzing, purely to save a dying race.

What a lesson do these illustrious benefactors of the human race teach us! How they study, and investigate, and labor to alleviate suffering and increase the longevity of mankind! And when any of them discover a remedy for disease, or a means of removing deformity, how eagerly they make the discovery known, that all the world may share in the benefit! In our hands, we have a revelation of infinitely greater value. Their discoveries can, at the best, prolong life only a few years; while the Gospel of Jesus Christ is the Gospel of eternal life and the remedy for the universal malady of sin. Yet there are among us men calling themselves Christians, who make no effort to publish the knowledge of that remedy. They say: "If the Chinese are not willing to receive our Gospel missionaries, then let those missionaries stay at home. Let the Chinese hordes grovel and die! Let the human streams of heathen life become choked with moral vermin! It is their own look-out, not ours!" I tell you to-day, that Christian America's foreign obligations can never be cancelled until Jesus Christ is preached to all people. The nations of the world have also other claims upon us, as a Christian people, that must not be ignored. If we have the spirit of Christ, we shall not be unmindful of their material wants. He who "had compassion on the multitude because they had nothing to eat," would never have closed his ears to the cry of a famine-stricken nation. If we would be like him, we, too, should feed the hungry and succor the homeless, the widow and the orphan. How better can we make known the grandeur and beauty of the Christian faith, than in proving to other nations its beneficent influence. As the hand of Christian America is stretched out across the seas, bearing bread for the starving, they see Christ living again in us, and bless his dear name. Having accepted from us the bread that perishes, they will listen as we tell them of the Bread that came down from heaven, of which if a man eat he shall live for ever. Were the welcoming doors of heathen India ever more widely opened for the Gospel message, than when the shiploads of American breadstuffs were floated across the Atlantic, through the Mediterranean, down the Red Sea, and over the Indian Ocean, until they were safely landed in the harbor of Bombay, during the awful Indian famines of 1897 and 1900? I have seen it estimated that hundreds of thousands of starving and dying natives were physically saved through American generosity during those two years. But no one, save the Recording Angel of Heaven, will ever be able to keep track of the multitudes of immortal souls who will ultimately be brought to the feet of Christ, through the contributions and the prayers of those who tried to some extent to allay the horrors of that awful famine plague. When did Russia ever hear a sweeter Gospel message than that played by the waves lapping the ships' prows, which carried American food to her peasants during the famine plague of 1892? And while we are thus considering the philanthropic aspect our national duty to other lands sometimes assumes, I want to make an especial plea for famine-stricken Finland. I make it the more earnestly, because many of her sons and daughters have migrated to our shores, and therefore, for that reason, Finland has a special claim upon us. They are of the same household of faith with ourselves, therefore, it is doubly our duty to aid them.

Though the religious and daily newspapers have been for weeks filled with the accounts of Finland's sufferings, the heroism and appalling misery that people of the North are going through, will probably never be fully told. But as I try to describe it to you in part, no words of mine can so forcibly present the condition of that afflicted land as does the simple statement which Inspector Leaitt, who knows that country well, gave to a representative of the American Press: "I have seen much of the suffering," he says. "It has been awfully black and is so still, take my word for that. I have become, through custom, almost hardened to seeing women and children crying for food, that was common as recently as two years ago. When I hear people talk about conditions being exaggerated, I think of how I have seen human beings eating bran; every mother in this community is delighted to get meat bones that have been discarded by more prosperous householders, and boil them and reboil them, until they float, in the hope of extracting particles of nourishment. You will be right in saying that we have staved off starvation till now, but God help us if relief should now fail us." Oh, my brother and sister, could any plea presented to you for food be more pathetic, more urgent than that?

Starving Finland is stretching her arms across the Atlantic, appealing for bread from Christian America. Dare we, can we refuse to heed the cry? Dare we, shall we stop our ears to this Gospel call? Remember that solemn question of the Apostle: "He that hath this world's goods, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?" As you love your children, think of those children that are starving. As you love your wife, think of those wives, and mothers, and sisters, who are now tottering upon the brink of the grave, because they have nothing to eat. May God lead you to see your duty in reference to this call which comes from across the seas. Then, to some extent at least, we may be able to cancel a part of the national debt which Christian America owes to the modern "Greeks and to the Barbarians."

CHRISTIANITY IN THE METROPOLITAN POLICE

POLICEMAN LOWE OFFICER W. E. WILLIS CAPT. D DRISCOLL INSPECTOR T. L. DRUHAN CAPT. R. E. DOOLEY SERGEANT E. D. STROPE ROUNDSMAN W. NESBITT

THE police force of New York city is composed of men from every walk in life: there are ministers and lawyers, doctors and dentists, musicians, artists, civil and mechanical engineers, mechanics of every trade, and also those who were hewers of wood and drawers of water. The majority are God-fearing, God-respecting men, many of them active, earnest workers for souls. Those of whom I write in this article are all active members of the uniformed force at the present time. They are doing their duty as policemen and are also striving zealously for the betterment of their fellow-man.

CAPT. M. O'REILLY

Sergeant Ezra D. Strope, of the Eleventh Precinct, comes of sturdy old Holland stock. He has a record for bravery and splendid service. He is very popular with the men and greatly beloved and respected by all. He is a Christian, having been converted in 1890. At the time, the idea of a policeman professing Christianity was the cause of much comment, one paper referring to it as a "modern miracle." The interesting story of his conversion is best told in his own words:

For forty years I was a man of the world, and you know what that means. I cared nothing for church work and had little thought of eternity or the salvation of my soul: in fact was very much offended if spoken to on the subject. This was my condition when the Salvation Army first came to this country. They shortly afterwards established themselves in the precinct to which I was attached as a patrolman, and I was often sent to their meetings to preserve order. For a long time I was indifferent, never thinking that I needed salvation as much as the worst sinner that was there. But after a while I became interested, and then my eyes began to open, and, although I was considered a moral man and a good citizen, I saw that I was a sinner and was drifting down as fast as I could go, and that unless I forsook my sins and accepted Jesus as my Saviour I was lost. Those were miserable days for me; and yet I couldn't keep away from these meetings: at every opportunity I was there, but still I resisted, and the wonder to me to-day is that the Spirit of God which was striving within me did not leave me. Many times the question was asked me, "Aren't you going to settle it to-night?" and I would say, "No, not to-night." Our only child was stricken down. Physicians gave no hope; and then I decided to ask the prayers of God's people, and promised that if he would spare the life of our dear one I would serve him the rest of my life. God answered those prayers, and thus far I have kept my word and have no desire to go back into the world, for I find it's good to serve him, and have been repaid ten thousand times for any sacrifice that I have ever made. I am to-day rejoicing in a precious Saviour.

Sergeant Strope is an active member of the Christian Police Association, a member of the Jane Street M. E. Church, and president of the Epworth League. On Sunday night, from 6.30 to 7.30, the league holds a prayer meeting from the band stand in Abingdon Square, and the sergeant writes me of the success of these meetings:

We are assisted by members from Perry Street Church and from Metropolitan Temple, and have an organ, a cornet and a choir of from seventy-five to a hundred voices. There has not been a time that our audience has not numbered over a thousand. These meetings have been a wonderful success, judging from the fact that upon each occasion from fifteen to twenty-five, both men and women, have expressed a desire to become Christians. Life is short, and I pray that God may open the way that I can do more, for I must work while it is yet day, for night cometh when no man can work.

Among the devout and conscientious Christian men of the police force, none ranks higher as a Christian than Inspector Thomas L. Druhan. He lives what he professes, and all his actions show his belief. He has heard the roar of cannon on the battle-field, and he has been a policeman for many years and has climbed the ladder to his present position by merit alone. He is always willing to help those of his command who are trying to do right.

Capt. Dennis Driscoll is another of the "old guard" of honest officers, who cannot be driven from the narrow path of duty. He lives in the neighborhood where he was born, and worships in the church where he was christened. Acting Inspector James Campbell, now in charge of the Tenth Inspection District, is another of those who believe in "doing, and not talking." He has been on the force many years. To Capt. Campbell, acting inspector of the Tenth District, was assigned the task to "clean Coney Island." For years it had been a stamping-ground for swindlers and gamblers, and loose characters of both sexes felt safe to ply their vocation there without molestation. All these moral offenders were ordered to leave at once or suffer arrest, and many went. Those who insisted on remaining were promptly arrested, tried, fined, or imprisoned, and in a very short time Coney Island was thoroughly purged of the vicious element.

Capt. Myles O'Reilly is a veteran of the civil war, a veteran policeman, and a devout Christian, who tries to live up to his profession of faith. He is literally a "terror to evil-doers."

Captain Robert E. Dooley is another of the honest, conscientious Christian members of the police force. Roundsman Alexander T. Atwater's bravery has earned his chevrons for him. He has repeatedly risked his like for others in the performance of his duty. He is indefatigable in all kinds of church work. He frequently gives entertainments to the inmates of an orphan's home, and in the summer he regularly gives them a day's outing at Coney Island, at his own expense. One can read in those happy little faces, how they appreciate the generosity of their benefactor.

The Rev. Herbert Lowe, patrolman of the Fifty-fourth Precinct. Officer Lowe was appointed on the force August 17, 1885, and, to use his own words, "joined the Army of the Lord about one year later." His career is already well known to readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. He was ordained into the ministry the 29th of July, 1901. He is thoroughly acquainted with the Bible, and has written many verses on Bible subjects. His endeavors to make his religion practical have brought good results, and there are many men residing in his precinct who can bear testimony to his teaching. He is an ardent advocate of temperance. Religion is not a fad with him, for he has been an earnest worker in the Master's vineyard for over sixteen years, and is a potent power in the cause of right. Herbert Lowe is just as good a policeman as he is a Christian, and his superior officers will corroborate this assertion.

Roundsman William Nesbitt is probably one of the strongest Christian characters that can be found on the force. He is attached to the Thirty-eighth Precinct, Tremont, as a mounted roundsman. When off duty, he is always engaged in performing some kindly deed to help his fellow man, and his "night off" is generally spent in some pulpit, preaching the Gospel. He was converted while attending services in the M. E. Church, corner Seventh street and Bowery, under the pastorate of the Rev. John Parker. He is an effective speaker and exhorter. He has been used to guide many a poor wayfaring soul into the Kingdom of Christ. He is an active member of the Christian Police Association, and of the Washington Avenue M. E. Church, Tremont.

These men have learned the truth of the Scriptures that "the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." They are wise, and are extending their wisdom to their fellow-man. Policemen, like other men, are human; their vocation subjects them to more temptations than those who follow some other pursuits in life. Yet despite all these handicaps, many of them are Christians and an honor to their calling.

THE PROGRESS OF CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE IN CHINA

COPIES of the fifteenth annual report of the Society for the Diffusion of Christian and General Knowledge Among the Chinese for the year ending September 30, 1902, have reached this country. All who concern themselves in this great fraction of mankind will find themselves much interested in this book of sixty-two pages, filled with data duly authenticated and not generally accessible.

This Society, made up of the missionary societies on the ground, includes the diffusion of that general information in which all agree. It is really the summary of the agreement of modern Protestantism versus the thought of China. Thoroughly Christian, it helps the Chinese leap the chasm between methods and considerations of the Chinese thinking to the methods and considerations of Christian thought in all of those bearings not strictly evangelical and denominational—in all the different departments of life, social, commercial, judicial and personal. This great region of thought not purely evangelical, fixes the habits of many minds as they reach the subject of evangelical Christianity.

The progress of Christianity in China, as well as in Japan, would be greatly aided if the natives thought by Christian methods. Every one realizes how great an obstruction are the Chinese printed characters, in any effort to obtain a knowledge of the people. Infinitely more serious and obstructive still, and far deeper, is the thought which underlies the language and the way of thinking. This pamphlet rests upon the Protestant missionary thought and progressive instrumentalities. The parties in control are largely detailed from the several missionary bodies, to carry on this work of general literature. It strengthens itself by printing every dollar given to its treasury, whether by the missionaries, or persons wholly secular, or given by native Chinese. It has in its pages, a number of pictures of the eminent natives who have aided this work. It signifies much that this Society, organized among the natives and people of the country, have distributed during the year over $62,000 worth of their publications among the people who read Chinese, and thus have begun to think by Christian methods. The Society utilizes the means afforded for circulation by the internal postal arrangements and the methods of commerce. During the year, they have circulated over 33,239 volumes of their publications, old and new, while they have a considerable number awaiting circulation. The Society gets over the difficulty of language—of going abroad to learn the language—in other countries, by putting the best thought into Chinese characters. The Society endeavors to bring the mind of China into the family of the nations of the earth, by issuing the publications which are sent wherever called for throughout the empire, and thus great numbers are beginning to think on current events as they occur.

A TRIAL BEFORE A MANDARIN'S COURT IN CHINA

The Society, on request, issues a pamphlet in the interest of the Anti-Footbinding Society of the country. So it responds to any great reform that is undertaken among the people. In the distribution of the half million of taels for the year, among the new colleges of the several States, the pamphlet gives the following: Chekiang, Honan, Kweichow, Fookien, Kiangsi, Kwangtung, Soochow, Nanking, Shantung, Shansi, Chihli, Prefectural Colleges in Soochow, Prefectural Colleges in Shantung under R. C. Bishop Anzer. These colleges for modern education all become great distributing agencies for the publications of this Society, and thus create especially a demand for text-books for modern culture, which would be greatly effective for its purposes.

The Secretary of the Society, Rev. Timothy Richards, D.D., has been in this country, and is personally known to many of our leaders of public sentiment. The friends are not surprised at the edict of the Chinese in their progress of modern thought, in which they commend his ministry.

A WEST INDIAN "DREAM ISLAND"

...By...
CHAPLAIN C. Q. WRIGHT, U. S. A.

ST. CHRISTOPHER appears a long way from the United States, after one has spent a few days there. The colored people, who compose the bulk of the population, have well defined classes among themselves. All the lower class, both young and old, male and female, are given to begging on the street and highway, as a side employment. The Portuguese have gradually risen from plantation laborers to shopkeepers, and are gaining the ascendancy in trade, thus increasing and magnifying the Catholic church, to which they all belong.

The entire island is given up to sugar planting, and from the sea looks like one unbroken plantation, from the base of the central mountain range to the coast line.

All things and customs here have a primitive look—the sugar mills, the buildings, the shops, the churches, the manners of the people, the fortifications. There is not a tramway on the island, and a tandem wheel attracted a mob that followed it as far into the country as the speed of their legs would allow. On the other hand, there is an excellent road clear round the island, and, at Basse Terre, the capital, a fine pier and landing, good new public buildings, a park, squares, a club, a weekly paper, and a daily sheet of cablegrams. Here the U. S. Consulate is the most attractive building to be seen from the harbor, and the Consul is one of the most popular and influential officials. He is Dr. Haven, of Chicago, and his good wife is as popular as he is. There is one mail-carrier for the capital, of some ten thousand population, with three deliveries daily. Rev. Mr. Price, of the Wesleyan Church, has the largest congregation in the city (two thousand). The "upper class" attended St. George's (Episcopal).

As elsewhere in the West Indies, the Moravians have long maintained an extensive and valuable work in St. Kitts (St. Kitts is a native contraction of St. Christopher), and in Nevis, which is separated from St. Kitts by a narrow strait, a little over a mile in width. The same may be said of the Wesleyans. I was gratified to find several excellent hospitals in St. Kitts, one a leper hospital, where about eighty unfortunates are accommodated, and where the several Protestant bodies alternate in holding religious services Sunday afternoons.

I found an interesting echo of primitive days in the local custom at Basse Terre of calling the English Church "the Protestant Church"—harking back to a time when there was but one Protestant body here. Another strange custom they have is that of a salt fish breakfast on Sunday morning—both in mansion and hut. Among the poor, salt fish and sweet potatoes form almost the sole diet, and the fish is none too plentiful either, though it sells for six to eight cents a pound.

Each church has flourishing schools, which are assisted by the government. There are weekly mails to and from England, Canada and the United States. A well-governed island it is; yet, without street or electric cars, book-store or news-stand, soda-fountain, wheels or automobiles, ferry-boats or trains or other features of modern life, it seems somewhat like an ancient island plantation—a dream-island out of the past, set down far out in the midst of the vast ocean, silent and alone—a little bit of world by itself.

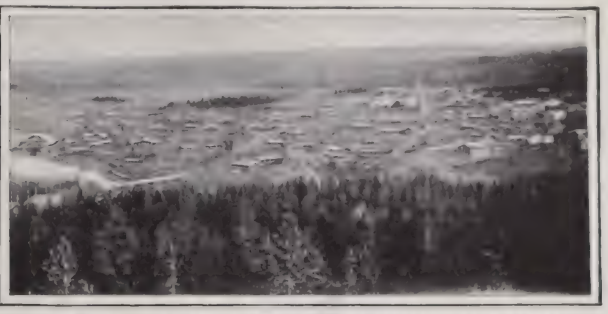
N THE HEART OF THE FAMINE LAND

. Klopsch Now in Finland, Personally Inspecting the Relief Work—$20,000 More Given for Food for the Starving

A WINTER SCENE IN THE GULF OF FINLAND



THE TOWN OF KAJANA, WHERE MANY ARE SUFFERING FROM FAMINE

AFTER a long and arduous journey in mid-winter, Dr. Louis Klopsch, proprietor of this journal, arrived in Helsingfors, Finland, on February 26. Owing, probably, to the ice in the Gulf of Finland, it was considered advisable to make the journey from altic port, overland, via St. Petersburg. He made a rt stay in the Russian capital, and while there succeeded in a marked degree in arousing a more active mpathy in behalf of the suffering Finns.

On reaching Helsingfors, where he was cordially welcomed by the Finnish Central Relief Committee, Dr. Klopsch immediately took steps to secure as full and urate information from the famine field as was available. On every side, he was met by reports of widespread suffering. After a brief but most convincing ssion with the Committee and its agents, during which latest reports from the famine districts were discussed, he directed that the sum of $20,000 be paid to Committee from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Famine nd for immediate use. The total remittances from Famine Fund up to the present time, are as follows:

an. 16, $5,000 to Helsingfors Committee.
an. 22, 5,000 to Helsingfors Committee.
an. 27, 5,000 to Helsingfors Committee.
eb. 6, 10,000 to Helsingfors Committee.
eb. 6, 5,000 to Stockholm Committee.
eb. 26, 5,000 to St. Petersburg Finnish Com.
eb. 27, 20,000 to Helsingfors Committee.

$55,000 Total to date.

Accompanied by Mr. Gilson Willets, and by several ding Finnish gentlemen interested in the work, Dr. opsch is now traveling in the heart of the famine vinces. He will make a thorough tour of the north- and eastern sections of Finland, and will personally pect the relief methods. He will have an opportunity to observe how the plan of giving employment to relief applicants works, and also to what extent relief is distributed as a free gift. There are many remote alities in Finland where it would be impracticable to pose working conditions upon the applicants, on account of the scarcity of labor and the general poverty the farmers.

Dr. Klopsch's Tour

Mr. Klopsch's tour will probably occupy the next two eks. On his return to Helsingfors, he will submit to Committee any suggestions that may have arisen of his experience in the famine districts, and will e such other steps as the occasion may demand. On ving Finland, he will proceed to Stockholm, where will meet the Swedish Relief Committee, who have pealed for American aid.

The readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and all who ve been associated with them in this life-saving cruade in Finland, will be glad to know that their symthy and generosity have already borne fruit in a very expected and significant way. Russia's heart has en touched by the evidences of American sympathy for Finns, and the Czar has interested himself personally. has ordered extensive relief works to be started thout delay—chiefly railroad building, swamp drainand the construction of great public buildings—and s expected that when these are fairly under way, the tress will be greatly lessened, and ultimately relieved. t the average government moves slowly, and even editing the Czar with the best intentions, it will probly be many weeks before the official relief can ect the general situation, or relieve the suffering in remote districts where famine-fever now prevails, d where there are thousands of weak women and chilen who must be helped gratuitously if their lives are be saved. It is for the rescue of these helpless ones at the Committee at Helsingfors and the local Committees throughout Finland must now exert themselves. If next two months can be safely passed, the starving ccored and the sick given needful aid and medicines, en the prospect will be favorable for a return to something like normal conditions in the spring, when the imperial relief works plan can go into practical operation.

Present Famine Conditions

Just what the present conditions in Finland are, may be gathered from the following letters, which have been forwarded by Mr. J. H. Jasberg, Secretary of the Finnish Central Relief Committee of the United States.

JUUKA, PROVINCE OF KUOPIE, FINLAND.
Jan. 6, 1903.

Amidst need and sorrow I wish to tell you of the misery that the Almighty has visited upon the poor Finnish people, to administer his will and correct both rich and poor, to show that no one may protest against his ways, no more than children against the punishment of their parents.

No work is to be had, and should one out of ten have some, what will the fifty pennias (ten cents) which he receives per day, be to the large families? Already many have been compelled to make bread from bark. Foreign grain is cheap, but money there is none. In the towns and cities large sums have been raised for the famine sufferers, but their help is not sufficient. All public funds even have been loaned, but even with that all could not be provided. Our parish has petitioned for 100,000 marks ($19,500), for the farm owners, but the distressed laborers are entirely helpless. Even though the older people should be able to endure the hunger more bravely, still the large number of innocent children crying for bread and clothing will cause their parents to heave many a sigh of sorrow, as they are not able to withstand the pangs of hunger like grown people. Often must we go to bed with our weeping families, all hungry, hoping that God may provide something for the morrow. There is no hope of conditions improving before next summer. Those most in need have selected me to make this appeal for help (in the name of the Almighty God, and praying for deliverance from this terrible condition) to you, and we hope that you will undertake the task of collecting money for our help as soon as possible, as you well know how long a day is in poverty.

We implore you, in the name of God, not to disregard our request, but to heed our cry of distress. ERO HUTTUNEN.

Another letter says:

KAAVI, PROVINCE OF KUOPIA, FINLAND, Jan. 15.

The punishment of God at this time is very severe, for, besides the famine, there is sickness and death, and the people here are dying, so that twenty burials are to be performed on most Sundays. In our own village, whole families are dying, and the famine-suffering is universal amongst all. Some aid is coming to the poorest people now and then, both clothing and food, but the farmers do not receive anything. No man can believe this story of starvation, unless he has been an eye-witness of a famine. For these reasons, many people are emigrating to America from here.

An Eye Witness' Story of the Famine

DREADFUL tales of want and suffering continue to come from Finland, where the present famine is the worst within the memory of living man, taxing to the utmost the strenuous efforts to ameliorate its severities put forth ceaselessly by the Central Relief Committee in Helsingfors and its many branches throughout the country. One of the most distressing of all accounts is that of an eye-witness who has just traveled through the extreme easterly section of the government of Uleaborg from the 66° north latitude down south to the 64°. In a corner of the extensive parish of Suomussalmi, under the 65th parallel, just where a narrow ridge acts as a watershed, sending the waters of the Vuokki, northeast over into Russia, and other streams southeast into the lakes around Lentura, there is an estate called Keskinen. Here poverty and want had wrought a ghastly picture indeed, and the degree of misery and suffering exceeded anything that had previously come under the observation of the travelers who tell this tale, and who had nevertheless had occasion to witness a constant spectacle of human woe differing only in degree.

The lot of the farmer folk who owned this estate was already a hard one, but what words can describe the abject misery to which the family lodging with them was reduced? Well might the visitors stand horrified and dumfounded with an overwhelming sense of pity and shuddering amaze, after they had, with bent backs, stepped cautiously through the low doorway and entered the narrow room, breathing an unhealthy and suffocating atmosphere.

The place was in semi-darkness, even though it was midday, for the small window-panes had been broken in places and patched with paper, rags, and bits of boarding, and what glass was left was covered with grime and smoke-stains. It was not until one's eyes had become somewhat accustomed to the gloom that it was possible to distinguish more than a few dim figures in the murky atmosphere. As their uncertain outlines gradually grew more clearly discernible, four or five children, stark naked, shaped themselves out from the darkness. The eldest, a girl of eleven or twelve, evidently ashamed of her nakedness, shrank back into the darkest corner, whence she emerged after a minute or two with an old petticoat of the farmer's wife suspended from her neck, and forming a sack like covering for her whole frame. The other children scurried across the floor in their Adam's costume, showing their crooked limbs and swollen stomachs and dirty skin of a yellowish gray.

A Sorrowful Group

The farmer's wife sat near the doorway, twining a thread hemp across her knees. She pointed out still another child lying in a cradle. "Every one of those children belongs to them—not one of them is ours," she declared. "Not a stitch do they possess in common."

Where, then, were the parents of this miserable brood? Further search in the farthest and darkest corner revealed a human creature squatting upon a few wretched rags. It was a comparatively young man, or rather, the withered figure of one. He was huddled together in a cramped position, trying to support his body on one emaciated arm. His sunken, dulled eyes stared aimlessly into space. His long hair straggled unkempt over his ears, while his pinched and haggard face was framed in a matted beard. Up from his bare breast and between his loose, open jaws, the breath labored hoarsely, painfully. Alongside of him was seated his wife, rocking a crying baby in a dilapidated basket, and staring unintermittedly upon the floor.

"Has he been lying there long?" they inquired.

The unhappy woman replied, without once raising her eyes: "Ever since St. Bartholomew's Day. That was just before this little one was born, and since then he has not been able to get up from the boards."

"Is it consumption he is suffering from, or what?"

"Who knows what it really is? In his side he has an open sore, which is running all the time. It is certain that it will be the death of him."

A Wife's Story of Suffering

The woman of the house laid down her work and came nearer to the group to give a fuller version of the woful story.

"They had their own cottage, sure enough," she said, "but last summer it was burned down, and the whole lot of them came over here to our place. We had precious little room to spare, but where could the poor, homeless creatures go? The father—this same man, Ollikainen—was a good, willing workman, a skilful timber-raftsman, and was perfectly able to look after his young ones. But all at once, he was taken sick and had to take to his bed, and, sure enough, he will never be well again. In six months' time he has dwindled away, till of the once strong, hale man, nothing remains but this bag of bones."

"But why have you done nothing for him?"

"Who is there to attend him, and what have we that will do it any good? It must indeed be terrible for him to have to rot away like this. The nearest drug store is at Kuhmo, about forty miles away, and, even if we had anyone to go all that distance after medicine, we have no money to buy any. We have not seen a single piece of money for months, and I doubt if there is now a cent to be found in the whole place."

The sick man's wife here broke down utterly.

"How," she asked in a torrent of tears, "is one to get medicines or bandages, when it is hardly possible to keep the breath in the children's bodies? Now and then we've been able to get a few drops of milk for the poor sick fellow from some compassionate folk, and that is all we can ask—any other sort of liquid it was no good even thinking of."

And indeed, the case was piteous beyond all words. Without such scant help as this wretched family had received from the community and chance visitors, they must have all starved to death long ago. As it was, the father was past all help, condemned to lie there and watch his own wife and child slowly starve before his very eyes.

The travelers spoke of getting the clergy at Kuhmo to send medicines and carbolic. They placed a few marks in the hand of the wife, bade her by every means possible get the most necessary medical supplies, and, with words of feigned encouragement and hope but hearts weighed down with pain and foreboding, bade the poor starving wretches good-bye. The Papal Commission

THE questions raised by Prof. Delitzsch in his lecture before the German Emperor, to which reference was made in these columns last week, are to be submitted to a Commission of learned Roman Catholic scholars. As our readers are aware, the questions are not new. For many years past, as the books found in the ancient libraries have been deciphered, assertions have been made that the Bible writers made free use of literature which was already ancient when they wrote. Thousands of the clay tablets, which were the books of the ancient Assyrians, have been unearthed, and upon them are inscribed stories of the Garden of Eden and the Deluge and other events, which, in many details, closely resemble the Bible narratives. The scholars pronounce them to be of a date long before Moses, and suggest that he, being "learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians," may have derived his historical facts from them. It is worthy of note, however, that the scholars are by no means unanimous on the subject. Prof. Hilprecht, whose knowledge on such subjects is vastly superior to that of Prof. Delitzsch, affirms that "the polytheism of Babylon has absolutely nothing in common with the monotheism of Israel," and he has proved by quotations that no part of that which forms the essence of the faith of Israel has been borrowed from the religion of Babylon. To this may be added that the principles of Christianity are not involved in the question, which relates to matters long anterior to Christ's coming.

In view of this radical difference of opinion among the only men competent to decide, it is gratifying to learn that the Pope, who evidently fully realizes the momentous importance of the subject, has appointed the Commission to carefully examine all the evidence. He has placed at their disposal the manuscripts of the Vatican Library, which is the richest in all Europe, and has authorized the members of the Commission to consult scholars who do not belong to the Roman Catholic Church. They will thus be able to call to their assistance Jews and Assyriologists of other faiths, which will be of immense value to them. As the questions involved are purely those of scholarship, and have nothing to do with the differences between the Roman Catholic and the Protestant churches, the impartiality of the Commission is assured. Many years will probably be occupied by the investigation, but when its decision is announced it will command the respect of the whole world. In the meantime, Christian people have no cause for apprehension about the stability of God's Word. "There are many devices in a man's heart; nevertheless the counsel of the Lord, that shall stand."

The Wesley Celebration

NEW YORK and the whole country, on February 26, honored the memory of John Wesley, by a tremendous bi-centenary celebration in Carnegie Hall, at which the assembled thousands listened to eloquent addresses from President Roosevelt, Chancellor Day, of the Syracuse University, Bishop Andrews, and others, distinguished in ecclesiastical and public affairs. The rally was a fitting climax to the great effort recently put forth by the Methodists of America for the extension of that denomination's church, educational and missionary work. But it was, more than aught else, a splendid national tribute to the founder of Methodism —a Wesleyan pæan to the memory of the greatest religious leader of the eighteenth century, during whose long career of active service, hundreds of thousands were converted and brought into intimate relations with the Christian Church.

It was peculiarly fitting that the celebration should be held in the city where Wesley preached his first sermon on this continent, in 1776, and where, shortly afterward, was built the first Methodist meeting-house in America. What a wonderful harvest has sprung up from that one man's earnest, consecrated labor! Over 80,000 churches, with a membership of nearly 8,000,000; 48,000 ministers and nearly thrice that number of local preachers; 81,000 Sunday Schools, with an aggregate of over 7,000,000 scholars, and 860,000 teachers and officers —a grand total of 24,000,000 of adherents throughout the world. In his own lifetime he saw the seed of his labors greatly multiplied, and when he passed away, there were fully 50,000 Methodists in the United States. But the greater harvest came afterward.

Although some eloquent speeches were made at the recent celebration, perhaps no tribute that could be paid to Wesley's memory ever equalled that which was written by Lecky, the historian, who wrote that the ministry of Wesley was of greater and more far-reaching importance to the age in which he lived, and to posterity, than all of England's victories. His influence upon English-speaking people throughout the world has probably never been equalled by that of any preacher or statesman of his time.

John Wesley's enduring monument is in the hearts of his followers. Zealous to carry out the great soul-saving work he began, they have penetrated to every part of the globe, spreading the Gospel of Jesus. They have dotted the world with missions. They have added to their legions men and women of every race and color, from the equator to the arctic and antarctic. Now that they have set out upon a new crusade to the farthest boundaries, who can foreshadow the magnitude of the results to be accomplished? Such zeal, such energy, such self-sacrifice, are sure to be blessed with a harvest that will eclipse all past triumphs, and which will add new laurels to the crown which the Christian world has already wreathed upon the temples of the founder of Methodism, and bring fresh glory and honor to the Master whom Wesley loved so well, and served so long and faithfully.

Is Smoot a Polygamist?

IT is now openly alleged by citizens of Utah, that Apostle Reed Smoot, United States Senator-elect, is a polygamist. In a protest forwarded to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, the direct charge is made that—

> Since the admission of Utah into the Union of States he, although then and there having a legal wife, married a plural wife in the State of Utah, in violation of the laws and compacts herein before described, and since such plural or polygamous marriage the said Reed Smoot has lived and cohabited with both his legal wife and his plural wife in the State of Utah and elsewhere, as occasion offered, and that the only record of such plural marriage is the secret record made and kept by the authorities of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, which secret record is in the exclusive custody and control of the First Presidency and the quorum of the twelve Apostles of the said church, of which the said Reed Smoot is one, and is beyond the control or power of the protestants.

The signers of the protest ask that the Senate compel the First Presidency, the quorum of the Twelve Apostles and Senator-elect Smoot, to produce the secret record for the Senate's consideration. This would seem to be a reasonable demand. If the allegation of polygamy should be sustained by the evidence, it will relieve the Senate of any necessity for action in the case, as the Mormon member could not take his seat, being in violation of the constitutional pledge. If he be not a polygamist, there still remains for the Senate the exercise of its privilege of expulsion, under a concurrent two-thirds majority vote of its members. By all means let us have the record.

The Interfering Outsider

FAMILY peace is often marred by the interfering outsider. Almost always, if there is nobody to comment or fan the flame of a quarrel, husband and wife will adjust a transient difference. A cousin, aunt, or indiscreet mother, who takes sides and makes injudicious remarks, will stir up strife where domestic dissension gives the slightest peg on which to hang foolish words or satirical jests. Every home is best by itself; but when there is need for the presence of an outsider who must be an integral part of the circle, she must beware of interference. Silence is always safe.

Love is the sovereign solvent for every household puzzle. If you are in a home where there is friction, whether a member or a friend from without, try the virtue of true love every day in little things.

God Heard Their Cry in the Dark

The Wreck of the S. S. Madiana Described by a Passenger on the Ill-Fated Vessel

FROM Mr. Edwin Ives, of Montclair, N. J., a passeng on the steamship Madiana, which was wrecked on t Bermuda reefs on Tuesday morning, at 4 A.M., Febr ary 10, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received a most i teresting account of the disaster, and of the providenti rescue of the passengers and crew from what seemed to certain destruction. Mr. Ives writes:

"Sunday (Feb. 8) began very stormy, so that we could ho no service on board. There was no dry place on deck; sh rolling heavily all day and all night; most of the passenge are sick in their berths, and have been all day. The ga unceasing all night. No sleeping to-night.

"Monday—Deck wet all day; the heavy gale increasin Heavy seas are washing over the sides. Another restle night.

"Tuesday morning, about four o'clock, our ship at fu speed, has run upon the rocks, one of the Bermuda reef about a mile from North Rock, about fourteen miles fro Hamilton. It was a fearful pounding and grinding for son minutes, when the second mate and steward called all pa sengers to put on life preservers and get on the upper dec as soon as possible. The waters rushing into the holes mad in the ship's bottom soon stopped the engine, and in a fe minutes all was in total darkness, while the passengers their different rooms sought to cover themselves with wh they could, and then put on the life preservers. The sea rushing in so fast, some reach the upper deck with ver little clothes on; bare-headed, bare-footed; very much co fused. In the hurry, coming out of their rooms to see wh was the matter, and being dark, they go into the wron rooms and put on anything that they can feel in the darkne which surround them.

"Men make the same mistakes, so that in some instanc the clothing of the sexes are changed. The sea is closing upon us. The wind is blowing a gale on the port side an the heavy waves come over without mercy, so that the wave continually come over us. The moon opened out upon us fo a few minutes, then disappeared, and we saw it no more, unt the daylight came some two hours afterwards. We are no in total darkness, huddled together wherever it may be, t escape the heavy seas, which continually come over from th port side, and threaten to engulf us, for there seems no she ter from them where we stand, and the decks below are eve with the water's edge. These are moments of great su pense.

"One of our passengers offers up to God a very brief an earnest prayer, that "In this, the hour and moment of our en tremity and helplessness, he will come t deliver us according to the promise which he had made, tha if we will call upon him, he will deliver us." We all sai "Amen," and we all felt that for Christ's sake, God woul hear our prayer.

"These are painful moments. We are now just waiting t be washed off, or go down with the ship, when she is eithe blown or pounded off the rocks. Oh! the intense feeling ex pressed on the faces of all, as the husband clings to his wife or the man to his friend, lest the waves should tear ther asunder, and we have only the light of an occasional lanter to see ourselves huddled together."

The account continues, telling of the dreary watch till day light, when they discovered that the ship was surrounded b reefs, fourteen miles from land. Rockets and blue light were used to attract help. The passengers were calm, trust ing in God. They partook of food, and utilized sails to pro tect the women from the waves. About 9 A.M. Wednesday the American tug Gladys reached the Madiana. The latte lowered her three life-boats, and the passengers and crew were transferred, the women first. It was a perilous under taking, on account of the heavy seas. Two other relief boat arrived later, and all were safely transferred and taken t Hamilton, Bermuda. All were deeply grateful to God and to their brave rescuers.

"Call upon me in the day of trouble, and I will deliver thee."

Unrest in the Balkans

SIGHTS such as that depicted in the illustration on this page, are getting only too common on the Turkish side of the Macedonian frontier. The Sultan is marching his troops thither with all possible speed, and has called on the railroad companies to provide additional transportation as far as their lines go. It is evident that if Macedonia is ever wrested from his grasp, it will be only after a struggle more desperate than that which ended in 1878, in the treaty of San Stefano. Meanwhile Russia is not neglecting diplomacy, for he does not want to fight, knowing well that a war is almost sure to end as former wars have done, in the loss of territory. Russia has accepted the plan of reforms demanded by Russia and Austria for the administration of Macedonia, and with characteristic astuteness of the Ottoman has made formal acceptance a basis for suggestions looking toward the issue of a new loan. The suggestion is logical, for the reforms will involve an increased outlay, and the Sultan makes no secret of his empty treasury. If the European Powers insist on his instituting reforms which cost money, they should, he argues, lend him money, or assist him in floating a loan. The reforms demanded by the Powers, and promised by the Sultan, include the payment of Macedonian claims out of the taxes raised in the Province, before any of it is sent to Constantinople. It is also stipulated that taxes shall be equitably assessed and collected, and that they be deposited in specified banks. But the most important demand, and that which the Turk will most surely evade if he can, is that the gendarmerie or military police force, shall be officered by Christians, not of Turkish nationality. If these demands were loyally and honestly executed, Macedonia would gain all that one can reasonably expect. The Macedonian Society, however, have no expectation that the reforms will ever be executed, and it is eager for war. It can never hope to liberate the country from Turkish control, unless it receives help from Russia or some other great Power. Perhaps at the last extremity the other Powers might intervene, though the Macedonian Society has lost the confidence of the civilized world by its lawless methods, such as the capture of Miss Stone, the missionary. All observers agree in stating that the situation is extremely ominous. It is possible that the Sultan's acceptance of the proposals may temporarily delay the outbreak, but the ultimate conflict is inevitable. It will, however, be matter for regret if it comes at this time, when Turkey is so well prepared to deal with it, and the Macedonians have no assurance of help in the unequal struggle. They will better take the advice of the ancient preacher, knowing that God sees their wrongs, and in his good time will open the way to their rectification.

> If thou seest the oppression of the poor, and violent perverting of judgment and justice in a province, marvel not at the matter: for he that is higher than the highest regardeth (Eccles. 5: 8).

TURKISH TROOPS MARCHING THROUGH A MACEDONIAN VILLAGE

Italians Duped

An Italian Commissioner in the Federal Building in New York, accidentally discovered last week a plot the full extent of which is not yet known. An Italian applied to him for naturalization papers and brought another Italian as his witness. The latter was asked if he was a citizen and he replied that he was. Further inquiries developed the fact that he had been but a short time in the country, but he held final papers, signed and sealed by the Commissioner himself. He was told to produce them, and went home to procure them. On his return he presented the papers, and they bore an excellent imitation of the Commissioner's signature. It was clearly a forgery, for the records showed that the Commissioner had not naturalized any one on the date on the papers. The Italian explained the difficulty. He said that he was at work in the City Hall Park, when a man approached him and asked him if he would like to be a citizen. He said he would. The man told him it would cost two and a half dollars. In a short time the man returned with the papers and the Italian paid over the money, and had ever since regarded himself as a citizen. It was a shame to dupe the poor foreigner so; but how much worse is it to mislead a soul seeking citizenship in the Kingdom of Christ! There is reason to fear, that at the last, many who think now that they are members of that Kingdom, because they have been baptized and paid their money to the church, will be excluded.

> Then shall ye say, We have eaten and drunk in thy presence and thou hast taught in our streets. But he shall say, I tell you I know not whence ye are: depart from me (Luke 13: 26).

A Flaw in the Title

One of the churches in the suburbs of New York has lost the ownership of its building. It is built on land which, forty years ago, was sold for only $300. The price was paid by the purchaser and the deed duly recorded, but the purchaser, for some unknown reason, did not call for it. Taxes accumulated on the land, and after the lapse of years the original owner, by paying all the arrears, regained the property. No one appeared to dispute his ownership, and he, consequently, regarding the land as his own, gave a long lease, which was practically a sale, to the trustees of the church. They erected a building upon it in which services continue to be held. Now, however, the heirs of the purchaser who neglected to complete title have made a claim for the land. They estimate the value of the land at $10,000, and real estate experts confirm the estimate. The trustees are advised to resist the claim, but have decided not to do so. They intend to buy land and build elsewhere. When they do so, they will doubtless be careful that the man from whom they buy a site has a right to sell it. One blunder of that kind is enough for any church, though it is not so serious as that sometimes made, of building up a church on a wrong foundation. The Apostle Paul's example in this matter deserves to be followed by all the churches.

> So have I striven to preach the Gospel not where Christ was named, lest I should build on another man's foundation (Rom. 15: 20).

Muskrats Cause a Flood

The people of Shelton, Conn., had a narrow escape of death, and considerable damage was done to property in the town on February 22. Early in the morning a huge torrent of water rushed down the hills back of the town, on which are plenty of muskrats. Their holes in the soil undermined the walls and making holes, which the flow of water enlarged. What a number of people would be saved from eternal destruction if they would pay as much attention to the warnings of the Christian ministry, as those people paid to the telephone message warning them of the approaching flood!

> He heard the sound of the trumpet, and took not warning; his blood shall be upon him, whereas if he had taken warning, he should have delivered his soul (Ezek. 33: 5).

Killed by Chagrin

A death, which occurred in a New York hospital last week, is said to have been caused by vexation and worry. The patient had once been an exceedingly beautiful girl, whose good looks won for her popular favor. She had been much praised on account of her beauty, and had a large number of friends who admired her. One day, recently, while sitting at her work, the kerosene lamp on the table exploded, and she was so badly burned on the face and body that she was sent to the hospital. The first question she put to her nurse was whether she would be much disfigured. It was necessary to tell her that her beauty was entirely destroyed. From that moment the girl lost all desire to recover. She fretted and worried and became utterly despondent. Her progress toward recovery, which had been encouraging, entirely ceased, and she gradually sank and at last died. The cause of death was given by the hospital surgeon as burns, but it was really a broken heart. What a pity it was that she could not have been led to see that it was still possible for her to attain beauty of character, which would have been far better for herself and all about her, than the beauty of face that she had lost!

> Let it be the hidden man of the heart in that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price (I. Peter 3: 4).

BRIEF NOTES

The Church Missionary Society hopes to send out at least fifty-seven new missionaries during this year. There is a steady increase to the contributions of the society.

At a recent meeting of the Zionist Federation, Dr. Herzl expressed his satisfaction with the condition of affairs, "having regard," he said, "to matters which I am not in a position to disclose."

Two Brahmans were recently baptized at Vizagapatam, in South India, and one of them told how he had been given a Bible thirty years previously, and he said he would never forget the prayer which had been offered up by the missionary who had given it to him.

Rev. H. Stafford Smith, the famous English Evangelist, now laboring in this country, has a few dates still open for services before his return. Letters from Rev. F. B. Meyer and other eminent English clergymen commend him very cordially to the American churches. Both by singing and preaching he renders most effective service, and that in churches of various denomination. Letters to him at this office, Bible House, New York, will be forwarded to him.

Mrs. Young, who has been laboring with her husband in Brazil, is now in New York on a brief visit for rest and recuperation. She reports astonishing progress in the work in Brazil. Fourteen consecrated Christian evangelists are now going through the country preaching under the auspices of the mission and they find the people eager to hear the Gospel. Churches interested in mission work in this hemisphere, which really has a claim on us, should take the opportunity of Mrs. Young's visit to hear her thrilling story of experience in this grand sphere of labor. Letters and contributions, the latter urgently needed, if sent to her at this office, Bible House, New York, will be forwarded to her.

PAUL'S MESSAGE TO THE EPHESIANS

★ Transformed Lives ★

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR MARCH 22 EPHESIANS 2: 1-10

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT: -- EPHESIANS 2: 8: "BY GRACE ARE YE SAVED THROUGH FAITH"

THE Apostle Paul, being a prisoner at Rome, was separated by sea and mountains from the churches which he had founded at Ephesus and elsewhere in Asia Minor. But he had the pastoral spirit which made him think much about the spiritual health of those who were his children in the faith. And while he could no longer see them face to face and communicate with them by word of mouth, the writing of letters became the means by which he could still instruct and guide them in things pertaining to Christ and his Gospel. Of such a character is the so-called letter to the Ephesians. It was not intended for the Christians at Ephesus alone, however. It was what we would call a "circular letter" written for all the churches in that region. We are not able to say whether the letter was taken by Tychicus in turn to the churches in Lystra, Derbe and Iconium, after it had been read at Ephesus, or whether several copies of it were made. The heart of the pastor was concerned lest his "children" might think more highly of themselves than they ought, and so he desired to restate to them the conditions of salvation, and therefore he wrote: "By grace (undeserved mercy) are ye saved, through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God; not of works, lest any man should boast." He would have them remember how helpless and hopeless was their condition before Christ came into their lives, and so he wrote: "You hath he quickened who were dead in trespasses and sins." "By grace are ye saved," he repeated with emphasis. He would remind them of the uplift in social relations which this new life had brought to them, and so he wrote: "He hath raised us up together and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus" (we, who in time past consorted with those who did the works of Satan himself). The pastor would remind his "children" that they had been "saved to serve," and so he wrote: "You were created in Christ Jesus unto good works." And the good pastor remembered that in most of the churches there were Jews and Gentiles, and so to guard against an exclusive feeling that might arise on the part of the Jews, he wrote that "Jesus hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us." In this he referred to the soreg, which was the inner boundary line of the court of the Gentiles in the great Temple. On the soreg were inscriptions at intervals, threatening death to any Gentile who might press his way beyond it. The pastor would impress them with the fact that they were no longer Jews and Gentiles, but all Christians.

Let us not be content to read the small portion of this marvelous letter which is assigned for our study, but let us read it all, imagining Tychicus as reading the letter to church after church. He was more than a letter-carrier, for Paul introduces him in this letter as "Tychicus, a beloved brother and faithful minister in the Lord," and further commends him by saying, "He shall make known unto you all things."

Illustration and Application

The epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians are much alike, having 155 like expressions. Both exalt Christ as Lord, but while Colossians presents him as King of the Cosmos (the world) (Col. 1: 16,17), Ephesians presents him more especially as King of the Church (Eph. 5: 23). Six times Ephesians refers to the "mystery of godliness" (1: 9; 3: 3, 4, 9; 5: 32; 6: 19). Many sorcerers at Ephesus had been converted, and had proved the genuineness of their conversion by making a bonfire of their books on heathen "mysteries," and now Paul sends them a nobler book on the "mystery" of salvation. A part of this "mystery" is the relation of God's eternal purpose to man's freedom, which is referred to sixteen times in this epistle. Another part of the "mystery" is the relation of God's grace, that is, the unmerited favor and mercy he bestows on us, which is named thirteen times in this epistle, to our sinfulness and Christ's sacrifice a mystery which angels "desire to look into." Conversion is yet another part of the "mystery." All of which reminds us of the mysterious Lake de Funiak in Florida, which Ponce de Leon thought must be the long-sought fountain of youth. It seemed to violate the law that water cannot rise higher than its source. For years no one was able to find a source as high, or otherwise solve the mystery, but daily the traveler and the toiler drank its cool waters and were refreshed, even as "with joy we draw water out of the wells of salvation," despite the unsolved mysteries of its heavenly source in love and law. Over a child's bare feet, playing on the lake beach, flows a cooling wavelet when there is no wind and no boat in sight. The child cannot understand why, but some steamboat, out of sight behind an island, the mother knows, must have started the wave on its way. The spreading waves of love that are reaching all shores start in the heart of God, coming to us from the invisible world, mysterious in origin, but blessed in practical effect.

Blessed Mysteries

The characteristic word of this epistle, however, is not "mystery," but "walk," in the sense of behave. The whole Christian life may be outlined in its five passages about our wrong and right "walk."

1. Ye once walked according to the course of this world (2: 2). Some years ago an Irish wanderer and his wife and sister asked a night's lodging in the cabin of a country schoolmaster. They were made welcome. It was the hour of evening worship, and so soon as the strangers were seated, the schoolmaster read the portion for the day, which was the very chapter in which our lesson is found. The visiting young man, unfamiliar with the Bible, was impressed by the strong expressions: "Children of wrath," "Walking after the course of this world," "Dead in trespasses and sins." He asked an explanation, and was told that was God's description of all who have not been made new by conversion, the miracle of a divine life imparted to a heart penitent for sin. When the chapter had been fully and faithfully explained, he said: "In this way of the wicked world, I have walked from childhood. I am on my way to a fair to pass counterfeit money. Here is the coin. Cast it into the fire. And tell me where I can get the Bible instead." A Bible was given, and with that new treasure and a new life begun, he turned about and went homeward a saved man.

Mr. Spurgeon, in one of his sermons, asked every hearer to sit down thoughtfully at home and write his name, and after it the word "saved" or "lost," in fidelity to the facts in the case.

"THAT GREAT SHEPHERD OF THE SHEEP"

"YE MUST BE BORN AGAIN"

In one home, a mother who was uncertain as to her son's state of mind and very anxious about her husband's indifference, determined to use the suggestion in the hope it might lead both to a right decision. On getting home that Sunday night she brought out pen and notepaper. Her husband looked on curiously, but when she started to speak and he heard the name of Mr. Spurgeon he hid himself again behind the newspaper he was reading. "I wanted to tell you all," said the brave wife, "what Mr. Spurgeon asked us to do—to write each of us his or her name on a sheet of paper, and after it the word "saved" or "lost." Mr. Mitchell at that moment got hold of the poker, and with needless noise poked the coals about in the grate. Meanwhile his wife was writing "Sarah Mitchell, saved." She handed the pen to her eldest girl who wrote, "Lucy Mitchell, saved." It was now Harry's turn, and his mother was greatly relieved and rejoiced to see him write, "Harry Mitchell, saved." It was his first open confession. The "baby," as the youngest girl was called, had learned in the Sunday School to love Jesus, and she wrote, "Alice Mitchell, saved." The father behind his paper had known all that was going on and now boldly said, as he was the only one left, "Pass me over that paper." He took it and wrote, "George Mitchell, l——" Before he could write another letter, his wife had seized his hand. "George, you shall never write that." "No, no, father," cried the children, "you must not write that." He tried to throw them off, playfully, but as they stood about him in tears, he broke down and gave his life to Christ, and when he finished the writing it was "George Mitchell, saved."

2. Created in Christ Jesus for good works which God afore prepared that we should walk in them (2: 10). — "If any man be in Christ he is a new creation (II. Cor. 5: 17), as if he had been "born anew," "from above" (John 3: 7). This is the same great truth that Christ proclaimed to the doubting Nicodemus. No less do the learned of to-day stumble at this new birth, looking to education chiefly for moral transformation.

Dr. Donald, of Trinity Church, Boston, in addressing a company of theological students recently, dwelt on two simple thoughts so impressively that they seemed like a new revelation. Whatever else of learning, or eloquence, or church machinery the clergyman may have, he must know God at first-hand, or fail. The other thought was the hearty acceptance of the fact of a miracle of grace. It may be called "conversion," or by any other theological name, but there must be a thorough recognition of the supreme fact of a divine help that makes it possible for man to take the chance of the heredity and environment of which scientists make so much and become a new creature.

A gardener had a rose-bush that he valued highly. There came a severe storm, and broke off five of its branches. But one branch was left, and the gardener, examining it, found that it was alive. "I will grow a new bush," he said, "from that stem!" That is a symbol of what love does for a lost man. It takes what is left of him, the remnant, and by the grace of God grows a new man from it.

It should be noted that Paul, in this letter proclaims not only the new creation, but its purpose, "good works." He said, in substance, "We are created anew for good behavior and useful service." To the catechism question, "Who made you?" should be added another, "What for?" Scientific men assume that everything was made to serve some useful purpose, and seek to discover that purpose. For what was man created, the highest of all the works of creation, with his threefold nature, body, mind and soul. A thoughtful boy looking out of the window one Sabbath morning, said to himself as he watched the objects in sight, "The sun was made to give light, and the cow to give milk, but what was man made for?" The church was next door, and he knew that was the place to get answers to such questions. As he entered the door, the preacher was giving out his text, "It is good for me to draw near to God" (Ps. 73: 28). The word resulted in his becoming a Christian, and afterwards a useful minister. In order to be helpful to men, we must first "draw near to God."

3. Walk worthily of the calling wherewith ye were called (4: 1).—At the fourth chapter as on a pivot, the epistle turns from the spiritual to the practical, from faith to faithfulness. An English boy, disgusted at a schoolfellow's dishonorable act, said to his mother, "I shouldn't be astonished at an ignorant street boy doing such a mean act, but the son of a lord—only fancy!" And shall not the children of a King walk worthily, purely, bravely? It is said that Alexander the Great allowed some of his bravest soldiers to bear his name; but if one of these conducted himself dishonorably or timidly he would say, "Change your name or mend your manners." No one who is dominated by greed or fear has a right to bear the name of the unselfish, fearless Christ. The distinguished Dr. Thomas Binney, in his last illness, said:

"It is a grand thing to have been a Christian minister; but if I had my ministry to live over again, I would preach one thing more than ever I did, and that is righteousness of life.' That is what Paul's "walk worthily" means. We ought to talk religion more, but especially should we "walk" it. A good woman who had employed a deacon to do a large job of carpentry for her, said after the job was done and 'paid for' "I would just as soon hear the deacon pray now as before he did the work for us." We are both to walk and work worthily. "The running of the foremost is like the running of Ahimaaz." "He is a good man and cometh with good tidings" (II. Sam. 18: 27). So are some zealous men, known not by their walk but by their running. Let us covet to have it said of us, "Ye did run well" (Gal. 5: 7).

Do the work that's nearest, tho' it's dull at whiles:
Helping when you meet them, Lame dogs over stiles.

4. No longer walk as the Gentiles walk (4: 17).—This message was sent to church members, professing to lead a new life, but some of them really doing the same things as the Gentiles. A servant once told me she never suspected that the mistress she had worked for seven years professed to be a Christian, until she happened to be at the church she attended on communion day and saw her take the bread and wine. Otherwise she had been just like the "Gentiles." Strange any true Christian should feel anything but elation to be chided as "peculiar" when that is the very mark of God's "peculiar people, zealous of good works!" (Deut. 14: 2).

5. Walk in love, even as Christ also loved you, and gave himself up for us (5: 2).—As Christ gave himself to die for us so let us give ourselves to live for others. Paul was so living at this time, forgetting his prison in eager efforts to do good to others by his pen when unable to reach them by his voice. Love crowds out not only selfishness and hate but also pride. "I have a peacock in my heart," said a woman quite elated at an intellectual feat she had been able to accomplish. That is a dangerous bird to be allowed to make a nest in the human heart.

When the Missionary Collector Calls

POSSIBLY you have never thought much about her end of the matter, or you would have a fuller sympathy than you show, when the missionary collector calls. I say you, dear lady. If, by any chance, you do not need this bit of a reminder, you can skip this paragraph, and pass on to the next. It is queer, isn't it, that the blessed woman who takes on her shoulders the duty of going from house to house, and gathering up the gifts of the church sisterhood, so often stumbles upon an inconvenient time. Either she calls when you haven't any money in the house, or when you have just ordered a new bonnet, or paid two or three pressing bills, or when you don't want to ask John for any more funds, and you feel annoyed in consequence, or she presents herself when you are deep in some task that cannot easily be left or postponed. You are apt to resent her coming at just that moment; your resentment creeps into your manner, and you are ungracious.

Yet somebody in the society or the church must assume the responsibility of personally raising the amount of the annual subscriptions, or, at the end of the year, there will be a deficiency. We are now approaching the period which treasurers regard with trepidation, the late when the yearly sum pledged or anticipated, must be sent to headquarters. The large amounts given by active and generous churches are composed of a great many smaller amounts, tiny brooks and rivulets that swell the great volume of beneficence, when, with the tidal strength of a mighty river, it flows onward to the sea. But for the tact, persistence, energy, and patience of the collector, most women's orphanages and other home charities, and their missionary activities would be badly crippled. Hers is an office that requires immense self-denial, and is often far from easy or agreeable, but she undertakes it without a murmur. Is she not working for her Lord?

Shall I tell you how you may lighten her burden, and your own, too? First, by a definite setting aside of a daily, weekly, or monthly sum, as God prospers you. On any day you prefer, the Lord's day being an excellent one for the purpose, put your ten or twenty or thirty or fifty cents aside, and do not touch a penny of it. Do not suffer yourself to borrow it. Allow no one to disturb it, until the time for handing the money to the proper person has arrived. If you can, let a mite box stand where you may drop any odd pennies or silver, plus the regular amount; but give a fixed sum, even though it be a small one. Have it at hand when the collector calls, and greet her as a very welcome friend for whom you have been on the watch. Should she arrive near a meal time, cordially press her to remain, and if she be cold or tired and it is mid-afternoon, offer her a cup of tea. Our soul's expand as we sit together, chatting over a cup of good, hot, comforting tea, and accompanied by thin bread and butter, it is a refreshment easily prepared.

Another thing. Attend the missionary meetings, and keep yourself informed about the work you are supporting. Hundreds of givers have a very hazy idea of what their missionary money really does. They have given it because the pastor urged, or the good women at the head of affairs persuaded, but, it seems to their own minds like money dropped into the sea. Now, this is all wrong. Go to every meeting, unless you are ill, or detained by the illness of somebody else in the home. Once you are informed and in touch with the work, you will be enthusiastic in self-denial, and your gift will be increased.

The Spring Sewing

If you have not yet lengthened Jemima's last year's frocks, or made Carrie's new dresses for next summer, it is time that you began. For, spring not only brings the robins and the blue birds, the green leaves and the daffodils, it brings, too, in its wake, the house-cleaning, and the moving, and the papering and painting, the gardening, the ploughing and the sowing. Spring is a busy season. Hot weather is apt to pounce on us before it is half over. The mother who can manage to get the sewing done and out of the way in the earlier spring, so that the children are ready to change their clothes from thick to thin at the right moment, is a good and notable woman, worthy of holding the home sceptre.

A Golden Wedding

The bride of the present year, in her slim and lissome grace, and her filmy wedding veil, is the delight of all beholders, but a very tender interest, even more sacred and sweet, attaches to the bride of the golden wedding. Fifty years of faithful love, fifty years of joys and sorrows, mingled and shared, fifty years spent by husband and wife in their journey heavenward! No wonder everybody presses up to the happy pair with congratulations and gifts.

A golden wedding was celebrated at Great Bend, Kans., on December 24, Christmas Eve. Mr. and Mrs. Isaac Reynolds gathered about them a great throng of friends and relatives in the First Congregational Church, and the exercises, consisting of music and recitations, with appropriate religious rites of prayer and praise, were of a tone and elevation worthy of the occasion. A long, happy and useful married life is, indeed, an occasion for rejoicing.

THE FIRST PIANO LESSON

"Sylvia," says mother, "strike the pretty key,
And make the music answer you by keeping time with me.
Your chubby fingers, little one, will toil full many a day,
Before you'll sit, like mother, at a great big box to play."

Don'ts for Mothers

—Don't say "No," when you may as well say "Yes."
—Don't reprove a child publicly.
—Don't show partiality.
—Don't imagine that your big boys can get on without petting.
—Don't scold the children because you are out of sorts yourself.
—Don't punish a child in anger.
—Don't expect good manners in company if you do not exact them when you are alone at home.
—Don't be anxious overmuch. If you set a good example and trust in God, the children will turn out all right.

Don'ts for Fathers

—Don't go to church, and then returning remark that the preacher gave a very poor sermon to-day.
—Don't be rude to your boy's mother, and scold him if he is impolite to her.
—Don't go to sleep in the evening over your paper. Exert yourself to be agreeable and keep awake.
—Don't find fault at the table.
—Don't have favorites. Treat the children all alike.

A Successful Philanthropic Endeavor

NOTORIOUSLY, boys and girls in reform schools, refuges and penal institutions are hard to discipline, rebellious and discontented. Girls especially, emotional and impulsive, loathe the feeling of the prison however it may take upon it any softer name. In the Iowa Industrial school, two years ago, the girls were insubordinate, continually under punishment and constantly seeking to escape. A kind hearted, practical, sensible superintendent was appointed, a man who knew human nature. He won the confidence of the girls, modified the severity of the rules, and substituted gentle firmness for irritating harshness. Mr. J. J Fitzgerald introduced music and games, offered prizes, and provided pleasant occupation for the girls. As if by magic everything was changed. Girls no longer ran away and no longer were shut into lonely cells to beat against the bars like wild birds in a cage. There was restraint, but it was that of a home, not that of a gaol. And the chances now are that good true women may emerge, to be useful to the community, from that institution in Iowa.

Such a man as this true hearted superintendent is worthy all honor from those who appreciate real philanthropy.

How to Make Money at Home

A great many ladies very earnestly desire to make money at home. They cannot leave the fireside. Duty chains them there. They have no special art or accomplishment, but they have a vague and hazy feeling that there must be something they can do, which will turn an honest penny. It is the very common mistake of such women, in putting their wish into practice, to try to do beautiful artistic work, which they should not attempt, or to write for the press, when they have had no training, instead of setting their hand to something right at their doors.

In every community there are bachelors and others away from their own women folk, who need buttons fastened, socks darned, and other clothes repaired. They can afford to pay for this mending if any one will do it for them. A gentlewoman is known to me, who makes a very respectable sum by taking stitches for busy women, replacing facings and braids, sponging and cleaning soiled waists, and generally keeping in repair the wardrobes of business friends. She, however, resides in a large city. A lady who has occasion to add to her income, might and should look around her, for some little practical thing, close at hand, which might do to aid another, and for which she might accept a small, gladly paid sum of money.

Kisses for Sale

According to the daily papers, in a certain country village, kisses were not long ago for sale on this wise. A girl kissed a certain marked ticket, and the person who bought this, presumably a man, had a right, on a certain evening of the bazar, to kiss her in public. I cannot think of a more objectionable method of raising funds for church or charity. A kiss is not a marketable commodity. In their desire to help along, women, young and old, sometimes resort to questionable devices for swelling the exchequer. Anything which tends to break down the barriers of modesty, and to cheapen young women in the eyes of men, is a thing to be scrupulously, and strictly, and severely avoided. Better have less money than more, made in that way.

Loving One's Enemies

Of all the injunctions given in the sacred Word, none goes against the grain with most of us, like loving our enemies. Possibly we have not very many, but we may be aware of some one in our group of acquaintances, who looks upon us coldly, whose comments on our conduct are unfavorable, and who does not wish us well. Hard work, it is to feel kindly and lovingly to such an one, not, even in thought, to return evil for evil. How are we to accomplish the difficult task? Why, by obeying the Master's rule to pray for those who despitefully use us and persecute us. One cannot very long continue to hate a person for whom he or she habitually prays by name, and from the heart.

THE LADY SERENE

By Edith Ferguson Black

CHAPTER I.—Continued

"MRS. THURSTON'S son is dying," said Nance Porter, coming soberly into the kitchen where her mother was at work. It seemed terrible that such a thing should happen to her, and the children had all walked home soberly, burdened with their news.

"Do tell," said kind-hearted Mrs. Porter, hastily wringing the soap-suds from her hands. "Why, whatever is the matter with him? It must be sudden. She was down to Grandma Grimby's a day or two ago."

"It's diphtheria, the doctor says—the worst kind—and, and, she won't let anybody else nurse him, and she'll catch it too," and the girl turned away with a sob.

"Nonsense!" said her mother, with energetic kindness. "Folks don't all get diphtherey. Tain't half as catchin' as you think. I'll go right along and see if I can help Mrs. Thurston. You hang out the clothes, Nance, and get the dinner for your father when he comes. I'll go right along."

But Mrs. Thurston met all the well-meant offers of help in the same way. "You have your children to think of," she said gently, "it is not safe. I should never forgive myself if anything happened, and I shall not leave him now."

Only Janet Moore stood beside the leaden casket. She had no children for whom to fear. She looked through the glass at the boyish face, beautiful as an ivory statue, but so pathetically young!

"'In heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father,'" she whispered through her tears.

Mrs. Thurston smiled, a strange, exalted smile. "Yes, it is no longer 'through a glass darkly' now."

"Goin' to take the body to New York, to lay him beside his father in Greenwood, is she?" exclaimed Mrs. Briggs. "H'm. I always said some folks didn't count Hillsboro good for anything 'cept to go under their feet!"

But her children joined the group which followed the hearse to the station, and, as the train steamed away with its passengers, Donald Ross covered his face and prayed.

She came among them again after a little, this gentle, gracious lady, and, as Nance Porter expressed it, Hillsboro was alive again. She gave herself to them unreservedly. She set her doors wide open and the children flocked about her. She was everybody's friend. Only Mrs. Briggs kept up her stony disapproval.

"Folks who have no axes to grind don't come to the grindstone," she said sarcastically. "You'll find her out by and bye."

"Listen to this lovely bit from Victor Hugo, Donald," said Mrs. Thurston one morning. "You love the birds. Do you know 'The Bird's Faith?'

What matter it though life uncertain be
To all? What though its goal
Be never reached? What though it fall and flee?
Have we not each a soul?
A soul that quickly must arise and soar
To regions far more pure—
Arise and dwell where pain can be no more
And every joy is sure.
Be like the bird that, on the bough too frail
To bear him, gayly swings,
He carols, though the slender branches fail:
He knows that he has wings.

Then she went out and closed the door behind her softly. She often left her message with him, without adding any word of her own. "Donald is quiet, Mrs. Ross," she said. "I think he will not need anything for an hour or two." So she shielded him.

On her way home she called at the doctor's. "I am worried about the boy," she said. "He seems to be losing his hold."

"It is hardly possible, my dear madam, that the life of Donald Ross could be a long one in the common order of things, and then, you know, the constant dropping of water will wear away the hardest stone."

"Is it environment, then?"

"I cannot say positively, but I should be inclined to think largely so. Poor Donald! He is a brave fellow—braver than most. It is hard to face life as he has done."

"You forget, doctor, he has a great soul."

CHAPTER II.

"Donald, lad!" Mrs. Thurston's voice was low as she greeted him, but it sounded to his weary ears like a chime of bells. "I am going to ask a favor of you."

"It is granted, dear lady, before you name the words. I cannot think of any favor which I could do for you, but I am very sure that none could be too great."

"Ah, now you have committed yourself!" she cried gaily. "Now I am sure of you, no matter how many times your lips may say me nay. Donald, will you come and pay me a long, long visit? In summer time you can lie on my verandah, and in winter we can study together. You see I need you for company. Do not say no, my friend.

"Your aunt is very tired," she added, as Mrs. Ross came into the room, "and she needs a rest. My old Mammy will be only too glad to have some one to fuss over. Her hands are so empty—now."

Had his ears deceived him, or was he dreaming? He lay motionless, while the hubbub of his aunt's objections mingled with Mrs. Thurston's quiet tones. He could not speak. And then there came the cool touch upon his forehead and the soft voice in his ear.

"Silence gives consent, Donald. The doctor and I will be here with a low carriage to take you out to Sunnyland to-morrow."

. . . . . .

Happiness makes the years fly swiftly, and Donald was still at Sunnyland.

"Take my boy's place," Mrs. Thurston said, when he spoke of returning to the old life, which seemed more than ever like a prison to him after the long months of delight in having his every thought appreciated and understood.

"I cannot take his place!" he had cried, in one of his rare rebellions against his destiny: "I am a cripple and he ——," and then the shadow which always bewildered him had swept across her face and left it ashen gray.

They read Milton together, and Browning—the old and the new: they companied with Shakespeare, and revelled in the majestic beauty of Homer. And then again Mrs. Thurston went to the old physician.

"Is Donald strong enough for study, doctor? I mean definite, hard work? I want him to go through college. There is such a thing as doing it on paper. Dare I let him try?"

"I no longer take the chances on Donald Ross," said the doctor, with a smile, "for you have given him an elixir which will make him a Sir Galahad on crutches." He looked at her with eyes that grew strangely dim. "Your definition of charity, my friend, has saved a soul alive!"

. . . . . .

"Donald Ross is to have a university education, is he?" sneered Silas Briggs, looking into the eager face of his youngest son, which was lifted pleadingly to his—"and you want to have one too. Well, I guess not. I've had to stick to my drill all my life, and 'like father like son' is a good motto. You can educate yourself over the onion beds.

"An education would teach you how to run the farm, would it? Well, I guess I'm able to run it without your valuable assistance. Next thing you'll be wantin' to introduce electricity to make things grow! I don't take no stock in these new fangled notions. We've ben farmers clear back for generations an' we ought ter know our business by this time, ef we're ever goin' ter. I used to think I did, too, but it isn't to be supposed that you'd agree with me. These air the days when the boys know it all, an' more too. Better lay to on those onion beds pretty lively, fer I'll expect to see 'em all cleaned up by to-morrer.

"I'm goin' to the store, mother. Is there anything you want me to bring you?"

The boy threw himself across the table as his father left the room and buried his face in his arms. His mother laid her rough hand with awkward tenderness on his hair. He was her Benjamin.

"Don't fret ye, Robert," she said, "Your father only means that 'tain't no use to hev learnin' without the money to pad it with. He's bothered over the mortgage, too, this year. The man that holds it has raised the interest. It just keeps us grindin' every minit. It's a poor time to ask him to pay out fer extry schoolin'."

The boy shook her hand off roughly. "If he'd give me a chance I could pay the miserable old mortgage off for him," he answered, with sullen fierceness. "I have it here," he said, striking his forehead, "and if he supposes I'm going to grub in the dirt all of my life just because all his old ancestors have done it, he'll find his mistake, that's all. He needn't think he's going to keep me from finding out things. I'll find a way, see if I don't."

He flung out of the house, and Mrs. Briggs looked after him with anxious eyes. He did not turn towards the fields at all, but instead, vaulted over the gate that led to the main road and set out with a long stride for Sunnyland. By the time he reached there he was full of a dogged determination. Nothing should hinder him.

"Will you let me study along with Donald?" he asked Mrs. Thurston, as she came to meet him.

"Why, surely," she said cordially. "Perhaps we might get up a class. It would be pleasanter." She did not ask if his parents were willing. That they should not be did not seem possible.

"Come in and have a chat with Donald," she added pleasantly. "It does him good to see the boys. Then we can talk things over, you know."

Donald greeted him heartily from his wheel chair with the revolving book-rest beside it, and Mrs. Thurston, with gracious courtesy, drew up a pretty rocker for him, and took a seat beside him. She was full of interest in his plans, and the hours sped swiftly.

"Where you been?" demanded his father, as he came in late for supper.

"Out at Mrs. Thurston's," he answered respectfully, still with the glamor of her influence upon him. "She's going to let me study with Donald. I'll be able to have an education after all."

"I thought I told you to weed the onions."

"I'll do them to-morrow, father. I won't neglect things. And I don't want to interfere with your way of running the farm, either, only—I want to know."

Silas Briggs brought down his fist upon the table with a force that made the dishes rattle. "Well, there's one thing I'll have you know right here," he thundered, "and that is, that a farmer's place is on his farm, and you'll stay there! I'm not going to hev any wimmen interferin' with my business. If I can't afford to let you set all day with a book in your hand, nobody else is goin' ter do it, an' you'll just understand it once for all. Do you hear?"

The bright look on the boy's face faded. He glanced at his mother to see if she would help him out, but, at the mention of Mrs. Thurston's name, her face had darkened, as she ejaculated, "Meddle some Matty! Always poking her fingers into somebody's pie!" Then the old sullenness closed down about him as he saw his beautiful dream vanish. Though he might defy his father and go to Sunnyland, he knew Mrs. Thurston never would consent.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S TRIBUTE TO JOHN WESLEY

From his Speech at Carnegie Hall on February 26

"SINCE the days of the Revolution not only has the Methodist Church increased greatly in the old communities of the thirteen original States, but it has played a peculiar and prominent part in the pioneer growth of our country, and has, in consequence, assumed a position of immense importance throughout the vast regions west of the Alleghenies which has been added to our nation since the Continental Congress first met.

"For a century after the Declaration of Independence the greatest work of our people, with the exception and crowning glory of the preservation under Lincoln, was the work of the pioneers as they took possession of this continent. It was an iron task, which none but men of iron soul and iron body could do. The men who carried it to a successful conclusion had characters strong alike for good and for evil. Their rugged natures made them powers who served light or darkness with fierce intensity, and together with heroic traits they had those evil and dreadful tendencies which are but too apt to be found in characters of heroic possibilities.

"Such men make the most efficient servants of the Lord, if their abounding vitality and energy are directed aright; and if misdirected, their influence is equally potent against the cause of Christianity and true civilization. In the hard and cruel life of the border, with its grim struggle against the forbidding forces of wild nature and wilder men, there was much to pull the frontiersman down. If left to himself, without moral teaching and moral guidance, without any of the influences that tend toward the uplifting of man, and the subduing of the brute within him, sad would have been his, and therefore our fate. From this fate we have been largely rescued by the fact that, together with the rest of the pioneers, went the pioneer preachers, and all honor be given to the Methodists for these pioneer preachers whom they furnished.

"These preachers were of the stamp of old Peter Cartwright—men who suffered and overcame every hardship in common with their flock, and who, in addition, tamed the wild and fierce spirits of their fellow pioneers. The pioneer preachers warred against the forces of spiritual evil with the same fiery zeal and energy that they and their fellows showed in the conquest of the rugged continent. They had in them the heroic spirit, the spirit that scorns ease if purchased by failure to do duty.

"Great is our debt to these men and scant the patience we need show toward their critics. It is easy for those who stay at home in comfort, who never have to see humanity in the raw, or to strive against the dreadful naked forces which appear clothed, hidden and subdued in civilized life—it is easy for such to criticize the men who, in rough fashion and amid grim surroundings, make ready the way for the higher life that is to come afterward; but let us all remember that the untempted and the effortless should be cautious in passing too heavy judgment upon their brethren who may show hardness, who may be guilty of shortcomings, but who, nevertheless, do great deeds by which mankind advances.

"And now, friends, in celebrating the wonderful growth of Methodism, in rejoicing at the good it has done to the country and to mankind, I need hardly ask a body like this to remember that the greatness of the fathers becomes to the children a shameful thing if they use it only as an excuse for inaction instead of as a spur to effort for noble aims. I speak to you not only as Methodists—I speak to you as American citizens. The pioneer days are over. We now all of us form parts of a great civilized nation, with a complex industrial and social life and infinite possibilities both for good and for evil. The instruments with which, and the surroundings in which we work have changed immeasurably from what they were in the days when the rough backwoods preachers ministered to the moral and spiritual needs of their rough backwoods' congregations. But if we are to succeed, the spirit in which we do our work must be the same as the spirit in which they did theirs.

"In the century opening the play of the infinitely far-reaching forces and tendencies which go to make up our social system bids fair to be even hercer in its activity than in the century which has just closed. If during this century, the men of high and fine moral sense show themselves weaklings; if they possess only that cloistered virtue which shrinks shuddering from contact with the raw facts of actual life; if they dare not go down into the hurly burly where the men of might contend for the mastery; if they stand aside from the pressure and conflict; then as surely as the sun rises and sets all of our great material progress, all the multiplication of the physical agencies which tend for our comfort and enjoyment, will go for naught, and our civilization will become a brutal sham and mockery.

"If we are to do as I believe we shall and will do; if we are to advance in broad humanity, in kindliness, in the spirit of brotherhood, exactly as we advance in our conquest over the hidden forces of nature, it must be by developing strength in virtue and virtue in strength, by breeding and training men who shall be both good and strong, both gentle and valiant—men who scorn wrongdoing and who at the same time have both the courage and the strength to strive mightily for the right. Wesley said he did not intend to leave all the good tunes to the service of the devil. He accomplished so much for mankind because he also refused to leave the stronger, manlier qualities to be availed of only in the interest of evil."

DEAD?

DEAD? Did you say she was dead, lad—
The mother you loved so dear?
Her soul to its Maker was led, lad,
By a voice that the angels hear:
But her spirit is with you yet, lad,
And the clasp of the mother's hand
Will guide you, unless you forget, lad,
That your home is Emmanuel's Land.

Dead? Did you say she had died, lad?—
That mother whose greatest joy
Was to have you to kneel by her side, lad,
When she prayed for her darling boy?
There's a murmur of wings on the wind, lad,
And a song that your soul can hear:
"Look unto the Lord and you'll find, lad,
That your mother is very near."

HE CAN.

Because He Has Been Over the Road.

A grocer down in Texas said that when he first put in a stock of Postum Food Coffee he concluded to try it himself to know how well he could recommend it to his customers. He says: "I quit using coffee and had Postum prepared according to directions on the package and found it a most healthful, toothsome beverage.

I had been troubled seriously with stomach trouble, but after leaving off coffee and using Postum, I gradually got better and better. That interested me so I persuaded my mother-in-law, who is over sixty and a confirmed coffee drinker, to quit coffee and drink Postum.

She has suffered for years with stomach trouble and food coming up in her throat after eating. As soon as she quit coffee and began using Postum this distress stopped and she has been getting better and better ever since.

A short time ago a lady who was starting West bought up my entire stock of Postum for fear she could not find it where she was going.

From my own experience one can readily see that I can recommend Postum very highly." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

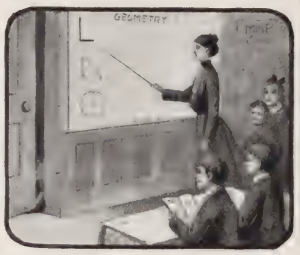
OUR SUNDAY HOUR WITH THE LITTLE FOLKS

CHILDREN, everybody, everywhere seems to be studying puzzles; even in foreign countries, people are pleased to be thus pleasantly perplexed. A marked copy of an English magazine sent to the Editor of this Department has such a funny story! It begins with the picture of a gentleman of mature years brooding over a "Puzzle Page." The story goes on to tell how sweethearts leave off love-making to work puzzles; and how other grown-up people are diverted from matters, grave or gay, to untangle puzzles. Well, enough of this story, as it is all about grown people. Of course, grown people are not supposed to concern themselves over our Puzzles, to answer any questions, or write any letters whatever about them. This is "Children's Corner." We are good enough to let grown people help the children a little in finding answers. We hope they will appreciate this concession and not help too much, nor write letters about puzzles. It takes up all our time to read all the children's answers. We cannot answer letters. Welcome, children, all! but let none enter the contests who cannot accept decisions cheerfully. We do not say that awards are to the "correct," but to the "best" answer. Of a number of "correct" answers, one may be best; then, of a number of very good answers, not one might be "correct." We have had some competitions, where, if our rules read "correct," instead of "best," no prize could have been awarded.

COMPETITION 27



What two proper names mentioned in Scripture do these pictures represent?

Write "Competition 27" plainly across the top of a postal card or sheet of paper; next, your name, age and address; then the answers. For each of the two answers employ but one word—the proper name which you think the pictures represent. Don't quote Scripture passages; simply state the name. Below the answer, write, in not over twenty words, what, in your judgment, are the most important facts concerning the subject of the first of these pictures? Read the rules given below.

Competition 28

Curious Questions

1. In Bible times did a carriage cost more than a horse, and if so, how much more? Give the price.
2. Mention two instances in which good men destroyed things that God ordered to be made.
3. Give an instance of a man losing his sight who probably regretted that he did not lose it earlier?
4. When did a mother promise in her son's behalf, that he should never make a change in his personal appearance that was made by another eminent Bible character?

Write "Competition 28" plainly across the top of your postal card or sheet of paper; next, your name, age, and address. Answer as many of the questions as you can, writing in each case the number of the question (not the question itself) before its answer. Answers to all four questions must not exceed fifty words in the aggregate. Read the following rules.

RULES AND PRIZES

Contests are not open to competitors over fourteen years of age. Only one weekly competition is open to any one person. If you answer both Competition 27 and 28 you forfeit your chances therefor. Do not send two solutions. There is no objection to asking the help of others, but each competitor must send in the answers in his or her own handwriting. Should you use paper instead of a postal card, be sure to write on the envelope in which you enclose your answer "Competition 27" or "Competition 28," as the case may be. Do not write on both sides of a sheet of paper.

All answers must be mailed not later than March 16, 1903. Address, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Little Folks' Department, Bible House, New York.

Prizes—For the best answer to Competition 27, a handsome silver watch, lady's or gentleman's. For the best answer to Competition 28, a handsome silver watch, lady's or gentleman's. For the next best answer from each State, territory and Canadian province sending meritorious responses to competitions, a beautiful book as consolation prize.

Answers to Competitions of Feb. 11, are:

Picture Puzzles: 1. Jacob. 2. Carmel. Curious Questions: 1. Hagar in the wilderness, when fearing that Ishmael would die. Gen. 21:16. 2. At the birth of Enos. Gen. 4:26. 3. "Let there be light." Gen. 1:3. 4. "Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in heaven." Matt. 5:16.

For the best answer to "Picture Puzzles" of February 11th, Arthur F. Black, Davidson, N. C., receives a silver watch; for the best answer to "Curious Questions" of same date, Harvey Tobie. Colton, So. Dak., receives a silver watch. Each of the following receives a book:

A Deaf Saint's Comfort

DR. KLOPSCH.—Dear Sir: I cannot tell you the comfort I derive from the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It is my church and preacher and comforter in one. I am hard of hearing, and so cannot go out very much, beside, I am over seventy years of age, and I don't know how I would get along without this blessed paper. I wait for and expect it every week, and after I have finished with it, give it to some one who gets as much comfort from it, I hope. MRS. M. LEWIS.

"Worth the Price of Three"

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, The Hall of Fame, and the "Family Art Gallery"—your marvelous $2 combination—have come to hand. The book alone is worth the price of the three. It is beautifully written and truly inspiring. Every father should see to it that his son has a copy. From such books manhood derives its impetus.

MOROCCO'S REBELLION CRUSHED

NEWS from Tangiers is to the effect that the power of the Pretender Bu Hamara, has been utterly crushed. The Sultan's troops have been victorious in repeated engagements. Bu Hamara is wounded, and will not lead the rebels again. El Lenebhi, the Sultan's Minister of War, is now engaged in subduing the refractory tribesmen, many of whom have not paid tribute to the Sultan in thirty or forty years. They are giving hostages for good behavior. Gen. Sir Harry Maclean, commander of the Sultan's forces, describes the general situation as satisfactory.

From Missionary Weiss, now in Tangier, this letter comes, dated January 29:

"We are glad to report to you, and to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, that in these perilous times we are kept safe from all harm and danger by our loving Heavenly Father. The Sultan is determined to punish every rebel in this domain. All the missionaries have made safe their escape from the interior, and are in the various coast towns. At the present time, there are no missionaries in the interior of Morocco. The American and English ambassadors acted wisely and in due time to save further loss of life. A few native Christians in Fez keep the missionaries informed as to what is taking place in and around Fez. These natives are not allowed to do any public work, and should they undertake to do so, they would likely be killed at once by the fanatics in the city.

THE SULTAN OF MOROCCO

"The latest news from Fez was that Shereefian troops had entered the valley of Beni-Warain and successfully commenced to punish the rebellious tribes, capturing a large number of cattle and sheep, and some prisoners. Additions to the Sultan's army during the week are very important, and enable the Shereefian government to send reinforcements to the front almost daily.

"The very latest news brings the account of the complete defeat of the powerful Hiana and Beni-Warain tribes; the Sultan's troops, under Kaid Omar El Yusi, having captured everything the rebels possessed, and destroyed their homes by fire. There is a considerable number of killed and wounded reported. Four mule loads of heads of the rebels were brought into the city of Fez, and placed on show. Amongst these was the head of Hiana's most influential leader, Benabida.

"It was stated three weeks ago that the Pretender, with powerful forces, was advancing on Fez, but this was a false report, as were many others which have been concocted here and published abroad. The fact is, that the Pretender has not ventured far from Tazza.

"We feel very keenly for the women and children, whose homes have been destroyed by fire, and in many cases the father has been taken prisoner, or had his head chopped off. Unprotected women and children are subjects of the most inhuman barbarities.

"We thank THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers for the interest that has been manifested in our work. Continue earnestly to pray for us in these perilous times. F. WEISS."

FOR FINLAND'S SAKE

THIS little gift I send to-day
Is very, very small,
For should I wait to send a greater one
I might not send at all
For like Peter of old,
I'm rather short of silver,
And I have not any gold.

But I know that He Who looked with loving approval
On the "widow's mite,"
Will not let this poor dollar
Sink out of sight.
For, 'twixt me and thee,
My heart is aching
For the starving people
Over the sea.

Those dear, good people of the Finnish race,
Shivering and starving in that desolate place,
My heart goes out in sympathy, tender and true,
And I wish I could send them all they need,
But I am poor in pocket.
Don't you see?
And that's my cross,
'Twixt me and thee.

Poor in pocket, that is all,
His other gifts to me are far from small.
Surrounded by kind neighbors and good friends,
The common blessings which He daily sends.
Blest here on earth with mother, sisters,
Christian husband, home, and love,
While father and the children dear,
Sing in the choir above.

Thank God, I'm not a widow,
Lone and poor,
Nor yet a needy beggar,
Sick and sore.
You ask, have I no treasures?
Ah, yes, I've treasures rich and rare,
But they're not here,
They're laid up "over there."

My Bible reads,
"Bear ye the burdens of one another,"
And so, day by day,
I try to serve my Elder Brother.
So now, dear Christian people—
One and all—
Do not withhold your gifts
Because they're small.
For He who giveth the increase
Will fill your souls with love and peace,
And when we gather round the throne,
We'll reap the good deeds we have sown.

Chairman King's Daughters and Sons.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

Mrs. A. H., Marathon, N. Y., writes:

I prayed that God would open the way for a dear one to find honest employment, and I thank my Heavenly Father who has answered my prayer.

F. T. J., French minister of the Gospel, Washington, writes:

I am thankful to the Lord that, at my ardent request, he brought my son home. I had not seen him for four years. He is not converted yet, but I hope the Lord will soon touch his heart.

A. J. D., El Reno, Okla., writes:

I have been helped by the Answered Prayer column. I want to tell, for the encouragement of others, how the Lord has answered my prayer, that he would convert my husband. I have been praying daily for thirteen long years, and now the Lord has heard and he has saved my dear companion.

Praying One, Farmingdale, N. J., writes:

A friend and myself have been meeting and praying for the salvation of unsaved members in our respective families, for some time. Sunday night one of my brothers, who has been a non-church-goer for years, accompanied me to the evening service; this week another brother came out openly for Jesus, and is to unite with the church next Sunday.

I. J., Whitworth Female College, Brookhaven, Miss., writes:

About three years ago my Sunday School Superintendent gave me a copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and has been giving me one every week since. I read the many answers to prayers, and my faith was strengthened. Now I write to say God has answered mine. I was very poor, and wanted to go to school, and could not see any way by which I might; so I told God about it. I prayed four years before I was answered. I came here last year.

ARTISTIC MONUMENTS

DUE respect for our departed loved ones demands that we erect Artistic and Enduring Memorials. Marble has proved an unfortunate [illegible] faithless stone. Moss-grown, broken and tumbled stones [illegible] everywhere. Some cemeteries now prohibit marble entirely. Granite, too, soon gets discolored, moss-grown, cracks, crumbles and decays. Besides, it is very expensive.

White Bronze monuments are cheaper and Infinitely BETTER

They are strictly everlasting. Rust, corrosion and moss-growth are IMPOSSIBILITIES. They CANNOT crumble from the action of frost. WHITE BRONZE is far more artistic and expressive than any stone. Then why not investigate it? It has been on the market for over twenty-five years and is an established success.

It has been adopted for more than a hundred public monuments and by thousands of delighted individuals in all parts of the country. Many granite dealers have used White Bronze in preference to granite for their own burial plots.

We have hundreds of beautiful designs at prices from $4 to $1,000. We deal direct and deliver everywhere. Distance is no obstacle. Write us at once for designs and information if you are thinking of erecting a [illegible] what expense you anticipate. It costs nothing and puts you under no obligations whatever.

Over $50,000 worth of work sold to Christian Herald readers in the last few years. AGENTS WANTED.

[From an incident in the life of H. B. Gibbud, Evangelist, published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.]

A PASTOR had said in his sermon one day,
In speaking of courage and Christian content,
"I'd sing the doxology, then I would pray,
If I hadn't a dollar, a nickel or cent
In bank or in pocketbook, stocking or sock,
And nobody owed me where I could collect,
In mortgages, chattels, real estate or in stock;
I'd still have God's promise and my self-respect.

I'd put my head into the barrel and sing,
If my flour barrel was empty, I would!
With faith, hope and courage I'd make the tones ring;
Dear brothers and sisters, I ought to and could."
He was theoretical, scholarly, wise,
His wife was more practical, poiseful and strong,

She wanted to prove that he couldn't tell lies.
The barrel got empty—she called for the song.
He smiled at the emptiness then, in her face;
His hand in his pocket found nothing but dust:
"We'll sing it together," he said, "and say grace,
My faith is so lame it must lean on your trust."

Then into the barrel with Christian content
They poured the Doxology and a few tears;
The next day a barrel of sweet flour was sent;
The sender has hidden his name many years.

We hope the two barrels were made into chairs,
One for the good pastor, one for the wife Prue,
And as for the neighbor who answered the prayers,
God "gave him a chance" when he asked what to do.
There's something to carry or something to bring,
God hasn't a place for the sluggard and shirk;
There's a word of good cheer and a glad song to sing,
Go right to the gate of the vineyard for work.

If those who are praying for service and power,
Would open their eyes and their ears as they pray,
Would furnish the money, deliver the flour,
The kingdom of evil would melt in a day.

JUDGING OTHERS*

Christ's Warning to Censorious Critics Against Vindictive Judgments

HOW difficult it is to discriminate between the sin and the sinner! How often the principles which should guide us in relation to each, are reversed! The severe reprehension which we ought to feel toward sin, the horror, the loathing which it ought to excite in our hearts, are manifested toward the sinner, while sin itself, possibly in some other form, is tolerated. Our Lord's attitude was shown never more clearly than in that scene in the temple, when the Pharisees brought that detected woman before him. We can imagine how a nature so pure as his, must have revolted at such a sin as her's; yet how compassionately, how gently he addressed her! It is only when we learn something of the intense love that he had for men, of the sorrow he felt at seeing them give themselves to evil, that we get at the true principles of action in this matter. There is to be no compromise with sin, no minimizing of its guilt, but for the victim there is to be pity and forgiveness.

Christ does not mean that we are to give up the right of judgment in all matters of offence. The State is compelled for its own safety to sit in judgment on the criminal. He must be punished to bring about his own reformation, as well as an example to others. In the family there must be discipline and punishment. The childish wrong-doer must not escape punishment, otherwise he may continue in his sin. It is the vindictive act, the harsh dealing with the culprit, the bitter censure of the fallen, that Christ warns us against. When there is a defalcation, one hears on all hands abuse and anathema, and sometimes it is hard to refrain from joining in the hue and cry; but it is frequently unchristian. How many who are loudest in their censure, would have fallen if placed in like circumstances! Christ's warning applies, too, to unproved offences. We are not to be prone to suspect evil in any one, nor to condemn any one unheard. There may be mitigating circumstances of which we know nothing, or constitutional propensities which ought to be taken into account in forming an opinion. Kindliness, compassion, and Christian charity must rule.

Gave Her Boots as a Reward

READERS of this journal will perhaps remember a picture on its pages about two or three years ago, of a school in Monrovia, Liberia, Africa, carried on by Mrs. Mary Sharp, and her helper, Mrs. M. L. Allen, missionaries. Mrs. Allen has since gone to a more neglected place, farther down the coast line, and has been working for over two years in that hard, lonely place, forty miles from any white person, except the traders who traffic along the coast. Her work has been to have a school for the young, teaching them the Word of God, along with secular things.

Several have been converted. Some of the children and women of the little village of Nana Kroo have heard the call, and are started on a pilgrimage to a better country. Some bring their children and want them taught in the school, and give up all claim legally to them. The missionary offered her rubber boots as a reward to the one who would commit to memory the most of John's Gospel, and one boy learned eighteen chapters so perfectly as to repeat them word for word.

A great hindrance to her work has been the famine prevalent in that locality for two years past. Her work is an unsalaried one. Any reader desiring to aid her may do so by writing to A. W. Minick, care of R. C. Williams & Co., P. O. Box 1384, New York, who will give all information.

ASKING QUESTIONS.

An Inquiry Changed a Man's Whole Life.

When you get a man to recognize that his bad feelings come from improper food and that he can get well by using scientific food, the battle is half won. One of New York's business men says:—

"I was troubled for a long time with indigestion, headache, and stomach trouble, and had taken various medicines but with no good results. I concluded to see how a change of food would affect me. I never cared particularly for cereals of any kind, but ate meat and pastry continually and drank coffee.

I found on inquiring, that Grape-Nuts were highly spoken of and decided to give them a trial. To say I was surprised at the result would not begin to do justice to my feelings. My headache left me; my brain became clearer and active; my attacks of indigestion grew fewer and fewer until they ceased entirely and where I once went home tired, fagged out and indisposed to any exertion whatever, I now found a different state of affairs.

My color was good, my muscles strong and firm and fully equal to anything I asked of them instead of soft and flabby. I live two miles from my business and walk it daily back and forth, if the weather permits. I am 55 years old and feel as well and strong as when I was 30, and can ride 70 miles a day on a bicycle without feeling any bad results." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

QUAINT PSALMS for QUEER FOLK

BY REV. C. H YATMAN

PSALM LXXXV
Psalm of Forgiveness

1. Lord, thou hast been favorable unto thy land: thou hast brought back the captivity of Jacob.

"BROUGHT BACK THE CAPTIVITY"

2. Thou hast forgiven the iniquity of thy people, thou hast covered all their sin.

3. Thou hast taken away all thy wrath: thou hast turned thyself from the fierceness of thine anger.

4. Turn us, O God of our salvation, and cause thine anger toward us to cease.

To be forgiven, fully and freely by God is the essence of eternal joy. Sinai brings death by Law. Calvary brings life by Grace. It is no wonder that when Mercy and Truth meet, Righteousness and Peace kiss each other. In this Psalm, the wedding bells of the marriage of the Lamb can be faintly heard. It is a queer saint who fails to catch the music.

PSALM LXXXVI
Psalm of God's Greatness

5. For thou, Lord, art good, and ready to forgive; and plenteous in mercy unto all them that call upon thee.

"GIVE EAR, O LORD"

6. Give ear, O Lord, unto my prayer; and attend to the voice of my supplications.

7. In the day of my trouble I will call upon thee: for thou wilt answer me.

8. Among the gods there is none like unto thee, O Lord; neither are there any works like unto thy works.

So great in his goodness and so good in his greatness, Note the "greatness" told of here. God to bow down to the poor and needy, giving them mercy, joy, forgiveness, and help in the day of trouble. Compassion, graciousness and long suffering in plenty. Crowning all with comfort. It is well written, "Among the gods there is none like unto thee, O Lord."

PSALM LXXXVII
Psalm of the Church

2. The Lord loveth the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob.

"THE GATES OF ZION"

3. Glorious things are spoken of thee, O city of God.

The one divine institution in this old world of sin is the Church of Jesus Christ. He who loves the Church is loved by God. Help to establish it, and he will establish you; pull it down by strife, and he will pull you down by strength omnipotent.

John 3, the new, bright chapter of the Bible, must be read with this.

PSALM LXXXVIII
Psalm for Deserted People

14. Lord, why castest thou off my soul? why hidest thou thy face from me?

15. I am afflicted and ready to die from my youth up: while I suffer thy terrors I am distracted.

16. Thy fierce wrath goeth over me; thy terrors have cut me off.

"I AM AFFLICTED"

There is only one thing worse in this world than to be deserted, and that is to be a deserter. Lover, friend and acquaintance have here turned traitor to pledge, and the billows of wrath and terror roll over the soul. Death seems to be the only companion left and the grave a final bedchamber. Ye who know this Psalm by experience, turn and read Isaiah 54.

Is the finish of your furniture or woodwork marred or scratched or dimmed by the wear and tear of years? Lacqueret is a veritable panacea for all such woodwork ailments. It gives a new lease of useful life to old furniture, puts a new finish on dingy floors, and covers up the scars of use and abuse alike. You can apply Lacqueret yourself, and it will dry over night. It is a translucent lacquer and does not cloud or disfigure the natural grain of the wood.

Put up in cans from one gallon to half pint in Rich Red, Rosewood, Moss Green, Light Oak, Dark Oak, Mahogany, Walnut, Cherry and Clear.

You can get Lacqueret at any good store that handles paints and varnishes. If you have any difficulty let us know.

Our interesting book, "The Dainty Decorator," gives many useful suggestions for home decoration. "Little Miss Lacqueret's Drawing Book" will delight the children. Sent free on receipt of stamp. Address Dept 15

THE POWER OF RISEN LIFE

Paul's Teaching of the Indwelling Christ

By Mrs M. Baxter

WHAT a prayer that is which Paul makes (Eph. 1: 17-23) for the people to whom he wrote! And it is for us, Gentile Christians. It was according to God's will, and he did hear it (I. John 5: 14, 15). And surely the Holy Spirit, who inspired it, and he who ever liveth to make intercession for us, prays for Gentiles still. God only wants the Amen of our hearts' co-operation. And having prayed that we may know thus what we have in him, and what he deigns to have in us as his inheritance and his fulness (1: 18, 23), and what the power is to make us this, he prays again (3: 14, 19) a yet more marvelous prayer.

He has already prayed for the Holy Ghost to come into us as "a Spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of him." Now he prays that God would "grant, according to the riches of his glory, that we may be strengthened with power through his Spirit in the inward man," i. e., the spirit as contrasted with the soul and the body. And why? That Christ may dwell in your hearts through faith (Eph. 3: 14-17, R.V.) God seeks to have his dwelling-place in us, that no spurious imitation, but the real life of Christ may be reproduced in us, through faith on our part and power on his. "That we, being rooted and grounded in love—we have only just as much of Christ in us as we have of love—may be strong to comprehend with all saints what is the breadth and length, and heighth and depth, and to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge, that we may be filled with all the fulness of God." That he may be filled in his body in its many members; that we, his members, may be filled with all the fulness of God. How wonderful! How far beyond human conception! And this was a prayer in the Holy Ghost!

God gave him to be "Head over all things to the Church which is his body, the fulness of him that filleth all in all." And now follows a retrospect. "You hath he quickened who were dead through your trespasses and sins, wherein aforetime ye walked according to the age of this world (i. e., the times we live in). Christ did not walk according to the age of the world in which he lived. His life was in a current diametrically opposed to the spirit of his age. And everyone who is really born again, and who lives in the power of that new life into which he is born of the Spirit, has lost his taste for this age; he sees men around him walking in a dream, pursuing shadows; blind and deaf to realities. They live in the things of time, and sense, and in the power of a life which is corruptible. Their "inner man," i. e., their spirit, is like a dead thing; and they are only awake and alive to what touches sense, intellect and affection. God is not in all their thoughts: for the part of their being which is capable of understanding God is paralyzed; they are dead through trespasses and sin.

And we have all been thus, walking, though we knew it not, "according to the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience" (Eph. 2: 1, 2). Every unsaved soul walks thus, and they know it not. How few of us realize that everyone is either a child of God, or else is "of that wicked one" (I. John 3: 12). God knows only two classes. And our life at that time consisted in "the lust of our flesh, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind." No mention is made of the spirit. "We were by nature the children of wrath, even as the rest" (verse 3, R.V.) Here we have, clearly defined, what we are in God's eyes before we are born again; what we are without the Holy Spirit of God. "But God"—now we have something of what he is. But God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead through our trespasses quickened us together with Christ (by grace have ye been saved). Have we really realized that God loved us, because he is love, even when we were dead through our trespasses—loved us while we were rebelling against him? It was by reason of that love that he quickened us together with Christ. Our real life in God has its source in his resurrection. "If Christ hath not been raised, your faith is vain, ye are yet in your sins."

RHEUMATISM

Relieved Without Medicine

Trial Pair of Magic Foot Drafts FREE ON APPROVAL to anybody.

TRY THEM.

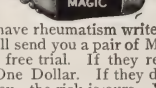
Don't take drugs—most medicine isn't fit for the stomach—but try a modern adaption of a very old principle, and treat yourself.

Almost everyone has soaked his feet in hot water for a cold in the head. Magic Foot Drafts open the pores of the feet, the largest in the body, in the same way, stimulating the excretory functions of the skin and enabling it to throw off the acid impurities from the system through these large pores.

Magic Foot Drafts relieve rheumatism in every part of the body. Here is the reason.

Every drop of blood in the body passes ever so often through the feet, where the circulatory and nervous systems are exceedingly susceptible.

The Drafts have great power to absorb acid poisons from the blood. Each time a contaminated drop of blood passes through the foot the Drafts absorb a portion of the acid poison, gradually but surely purifying the blood—the only way to permanently relieve rheumatism.



If you have rheumatism write us to-day and we will send you a pair of Magic Foot Drafts on free trial. If they relieve you send us One Dollar. If they don't, keep your money—the risk is ours. We know that they give permanent relief. Write to-day to the MAGIC FOOT DRAFT COMPANY, R A 11 Oliver Bldg., Jackson, Mich. Send no money—only your name.

CHRISTIAN EDUCATION*

The Development of the Spiritual Nature the True Object of Christianity

WHEN a child has been taught the facts of history, science, mathematics and perhaps one or two languages, he is generally supposed to be educated. It is possible that he is educated, but too often it happens that he is not. The mere storing of his mind with knowledge, alone, is not education. It is in the training of his mind and the development of his mental powers that education consists. The dull, stupid young people that abound in society are examples of the effect of mental indigestion. They have plenty of knowledge but it has not been assimilated. Christian education often has the same defect. There are young people who are strictly orthodox, who know exactly what are the doctrines of the different denominations, who are familiar with the Bible passages on which those doctrines are based, yet who are destitute of Christian education. Mr. Moody used to compare that condition with a locomotive standing still on the tracks, without fire or water. It was a locomotive, but useless, until power entered into it.

Christian education is a development of the mental and spiritual powers. It is an application to life and conduct of the sublime truths of Christianity. The man who is leading a wicked or a useless life is condemned, even though his orthodoxy may be unassailable. How often the Christian is violent and passionate in temper, selfish in his dealings, negligent of his duty to the poor, censorious of his brethren, miserly in his hoarding, unforgiving to those who have injured him, uncharitable in his judgment, while regularly attending the services of his church, and leading an irreproachable moral life. Such men are in need of Christian education. Religion is of no use as mere head-knowledge. It does not consist in observances, or rites, or ceremonies. It consists in an attuning of the spirit to the spirit of Christ, so that the sweet kindliness, the gentleness, the unselfishness, the love that characterized Christ shall be seen in his followers. It is a high ideal, but nothing short of that should ever be the Christian standard. And it is attainable, because to one who strives after it the Holy Spirit is given without measure.

I Propose to More than Double My Fee

My system is built around Alois P. Swoboda. It depends upon me and my intimate knowledge of human ailments and their treatment. There is a limit to my personal effort. I cannot give individual attention to more than a limited number of pupils.

I must either restrict the number of my pupils or neglect some of them.

I will not neglect a pupil—I certainly have no intention of reducing my income, hence the increase.

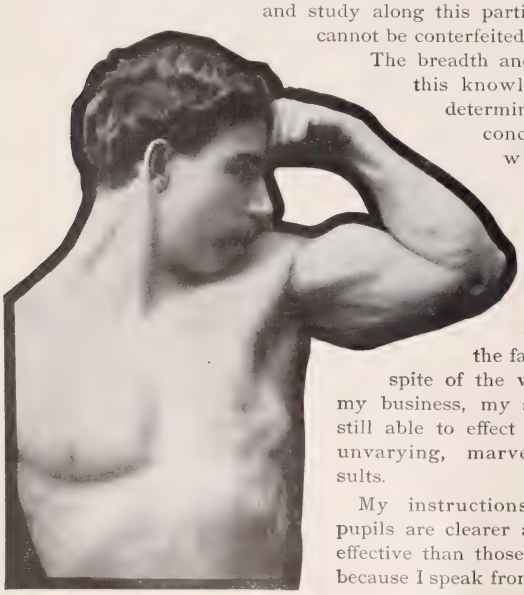
My system has always been worth more than twice the amount I have charged and many times as much as any other system.

Out of a spirit of fairness to those to whom I have already stated my fee, I make this public announcement so that they may either enroll themselves at once, or have no complaint at the future increase.

I cannot regard great swelling muscles, or the ability to snap chains and lift horses, or even a knowledge of the Marquis of Queensbury rules, as qualifying a man to keep in repair the most delicate of all organisms, the human system.

I am glad when a thinker begins to investigate the various systems for attaining physical excellence, for when a thinking man investigates, MY system is invariably selected. There is no other like it.

It is obviously impossible to imitate my instruction, not only because it differs according to the needs of each individual case, but also because my experience in the successful treatment of many thousands of different cases; my years of investigation and study along this particular line cannot be conterfeited.



The breadth and depth of this knowledge—the determination and concentration which my individual attention to each case demand, are evidenced by the fact that, in spite of the volume of my business, my system is still able to effect the same unvarying, marvelous results.

My instructions to my pupils are clearer and more effective than those of others because I speak from years of successful experience. I KNOW.

There is no guess work. Scientific physiological exercise is NOT a fad. Fads do not relieve hopeless cases of indigestion, dyspepsia, neurasthenia, insomnia and rheumatism, liver trouble and nervous diseases of every description, etc.

My system not only does this, but it rounds out the ungraceful form, puts muscle where it is needed, reduces obesity, purifies the blood and, in fact, fits man, woman or child to nature's perfect mold.

It is right living in condensed form. By it the evil effects of wrong living are neutralized and a splendid condition of robust mental and physical health assured.

This is done without distasteful dieting and without discomfort of any nature. It makes men strong, alert and graceful. It gives women beauty of figure and grace of carriage, with a clear skin, bright eyes and rosy cheeks.

My system is taught by mail only and with perfect success requires no apparatus whatever and but a few minutes' time in your own room just before retiring, and it is the only one which does not overtax the heart.

There is no wasted effort, no wasted time, the instruction is entirely individual and will fit the exact requirements of YOUR CASE. I don't ask you to take my word for this; judge me by my works—they speak louder than words. Below is the unsolicited testimony of a man who knows through personal experience what the Swoboda system will do. This man is one of thousands. He has no earthly interest in me or my system beyond what it has done for him.

Here is a Letter Received from the Cashier of the German National Bank of Marietta, Ohio. It Tells an Interesting Story, Because It's True.

ALOIS P. SWOBODA, CHICAGO, ILL. MARIETTA, OHIO, FEB. 21, 1902.

Dear Sir:—It gives me pleasure to be able to testify to the benefits I have derived from your system of physiological exercise.

Last winter I suffered all the time with neuralgia in back of head and neck. I began the winter with same trouble. After four weeks under your system, I was entirely free from neuralgia pains and have not had a return of them. I have not felt so well, or enjoyed such good spirits in years as I have in the past few months, and I give your system the entire credit. It is great. Yours very truly, (Signed) S. L. ANGLE.

If you want the names and addresses of others for personal investigation, I will gladly furnish them.

I shall be pleased to send you free valuable information and detailed outline of my system, its principles and effects, upon application. This information which I furnish free is very interesting and cannot be secured elsewhere at any price. Write at once.

Our Sisters in India

Ten Years' Work Among the Young Girls of India's Capital

THE wonderful work that the readers of this journal are doing in India among the native orphans, over five thousand of whom are being fed, clothed and educated, by generous Christians, under the auspices of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has encouraged the hope that they may be interested in another work. It is that of the Young Women's Christian Association, which has proved as beneficent to the young women of India as to those of other lands. The conditions in India render an institution of that kind an important aid to missionary work. It is so difficult for a woman earning her own livelihood in India, to overcome the prejudice existing in the native mind against self-supporting women, that she, more than her sisters, needs the aid given by association and friendly intercourse. She needs, also, in many cases, a Christian home that will protect her from the approaches of designing men. Gathered in such a home, the inmates are better able to nourish the Christian life and to devise plans for reaching their native sisters with the Gospel. It is chiefly by women that the native women of India must be evangelized. Although the broader culture now existing in India has worked wonders in opening the way to the woman's ear, there are many doors still closed against the male missionary, but open gladly to a woman.

Y. W. C. A. BUILDING IN CALCUTTA

In view of these conditions, a Young Women's Christian Association has been organized, and has done excellent work. Its benefits have been appreciated, and applications for membership have so increased that better quarters are needed. The white girls, daughters of civil and military officers in British employ, the Eurasian or half-castes, and the native Christians in membership are so numerous, that the present quarters in Calcutta are inconveniently crowded, and there is no possibility of taking advantage of the opportunity that now offers itself of extending the benefit still further. The managers of the Association are now planning to have a home which shall belong to the Association, and shall have more commodious quarters for meeting and for boarding members. Remembering the sympathy displayed by the Christian citizens of the United States with India in her hour of trial, they appeal to us for help in the effort, and have sent Miss Minnie L. Collins, their General Secretary, to this country to present the appeal. Following is Miss Collins' story in her own words:

"In the year 1893, a lady was sent to Calcutta by the committee of the World's Y. W. C. A., to see what openings there were for Association work in that city. She received such a warm welcome from all classes of English speaking young women (European, Eurasian, and native), employed in schools, stores, offices, business houses, etc., and such an urgent appeal to open a Home where it would be possible for them to live cheaply and comfortably, under the influence of Christian teaching, that she wrote to her committee, urging them to send out more workers at once, and in 1894 two other ladies joined her. The Home was opened, and soon filled to overflowing. Bible classes were started in schools, business houses, hospitals, amongst soldiers' wives, for girls employed in printing presses, and other places. Classes in typewriting, shorthand, dressmaking, cooking, nursing, physical drill, and other useful subjects were opened, and the work developed rapidly. In 1900 it was found necessary to rent another house for Institute work, and now both houses are too small to meet the demands made upon them. The need for enlarging the work has never been so great as it is now. There are hundreds of girls in Calcutta who need the help and protection of the Y. W. C. A., and applications have constantly to be refused from those who want to come into the Home, which has accommodation for twenty-seven only, and the need for a larger house is very great. The Institute, which is open all day, and every day, to girls, and young women of all classes and creeds, is much too small, and the committee feel the time has come for the Association to have a building of its own, with a Home large enough to accommodate fifty boarders, and an Institute specially adapted to meet the needs of the many young women in Calcutta.

A GROUP OF OFFICERS AND MEMBERS OF THE YOUNG WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION, OF CALCUTTA

"To buy or build such a house will cost $50,000—nearly $20,000 have already been subscribed. When the whole amount has been raised, it is hoped that the work will be self-supporting, which is impossible at present, while the Association has to pay rent. The average salary received by Eurasian young women employed in dry goods stores is from $10 to $20 per month, out of which they have to pay all their living expenses, clothing, etc., so that the amount they are able to pay for board and lodging is very small. It is almost impossible for those living in this favored land to realize what a boon an association like the Y. W. C. A. is to lonely girls living in the midst of terrible temptations, with evil influences all around them: and unasked for testimonies are often received from those who have been cheered and helped, and in many cases led to know Jesus Christ as a Saviour.

"One young woman, who had left her home in Scotland in answer to an advertisement, found on her arrival in Calcutta that it was a trap which unscrupulous persons had laid for her. Terrified when she discovered where she was, she escaped from the house at night, and sought protection in the Y. W. C. A. Home. Heartsick and homesick, the girl found what she needed—sympathy and loving help in her time of need. Sick ones have been nursed and cared for, and girls from almost every nation have at times found a resting place in the Association.

"The work has increased so rapidly during the last ten years, that there are now 120 branches in India, with a membership of over 5,000. Twenty-three qualified workers (American and English), a national committee, and a magazine, published monthly, called The Young Women of India, with a circulation of 2,500.

"Miss Minnie L. Collins, the general secretary of the Calcutta Association, is at present in New York seeking to raise funds for the new building. Will the mothers who read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and want to help and comfort other mothers whose daughters are in peril, and the girls who have happy homes and shielded lives, stretch out a helping hand to their less favored sisters in Calcutta? Any sum, no matter how small, will be gratefully received by Miss Collins, at 21 East Forty-fourth Street New York City, where she would be glad to see any one who cared to know more about the work, and to explain more fully the plans and prospects of the Association."

ROUND THE CLOCK in the WHITE HOUSE

THE Chief Executive of this great nation works more long hours and harder than the great majority of his seventy million fellow-citizens. At Oyster Bay, the President's family are betimes risers, and the eight o'clock breakfast there is shared by all the members of the household. In Washington, this is not always possible. Miss Alice is often away from home on a visit, Teddy and Kermit are at Croton, at the Academy; from Monday until Friday, Ethel is at the Cathedral, an Episcopalian school near Washington; while Quentin, the baby, still has his meals in the nursery, and so it usually happens that Archie, who goes to a public school of the city, is the only one of the children who takes breakfast with his parents.

This little lad has the faculty of making things lively wherever he is, and often brings in his pets—dog Jack, the Manchurian Terrier, and Tom Swartz, the coon cat—to show off their latest tricks, while his elders are finishing their meal.

Before breakfast, the President hastily glances through the leading morning papers. Shortly after nine, he leaves the White House, and passing through the West Colonnade enters his office in the Executive Building, which was erected last summer near the entrance of the grounds, opposite the State, War, and Navy Building. He seats himself at his desk to sign a huge pile of papers that are waiting his signature. This finished, he calls for his mail. A vast amount comes addressed to him, but it is sifted out by the executive clerks under Secretary Loeb, and then sent to Secretary Cortelyou, who carefully culls from it that which needs to go to the President. Only that which is from his personal friends, or that pertaining to most important business, reaches him, and few letters are answered personally by the President. To the majority he dictates a reply briefly to one of his secretaries; in a few cases, he dictates an answer and signs his name; but only to his most intimate friends does he write autograph letters.

When the mail is out of the way, his "busy day" begins. Captain Loeffler (who for twenty-six years has been in charge of the President's door, and who has a most marvelous memory for names and faces), comes in and says:

"Good morning, Mr. President. There is a delegation of gentlemen in the outer office waiting, who say they have an engagement with you at ten, to extend an invitation to attend the dinner to be given by the Business Men's Club of their city."

"That's right, Loeffler, they have," says the President heartily. "Bring them in at once, and, in a moment, eight well-groomed men enter, each of whom the President grasps by the hand and welcomes cordially. He listens attentively while the grave spokesman makes his speech, and he promises to be present if it does not interfere with his official duties. After a moment more of pleasant conversation, the party file out.

"More waiting out here, Mr. President," says Captain Loeffler, again appearing at the door, "they want to ask you to prevent the dredging of the Great Lakes by the Government. One of the Senators from Wisconsin and several members of Congress are with them."

"Tell them to come in, Captain," says the President, and in another minute he has shaken hands just as heartily with a party of twenty, and gives the closest attention while the Senator presents the subject to him. A few pointed, intelligent questions follow, and then directing them to see the War Secretary, to whom the matter must be referred, he bows them out.

"The Secretary of State, with an Illinois Senator, are waiting to see you, Mr. President," next announces the faithful portal guardian.

The President crosses over into his private office, and, for three-quarters of an hour, is closeted with his premier and the Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate in an important conference on the Panama Canal treaty. Just as he emerges from the room, a Congressional delegation from a Western State appear in a body to urge the appointment of one of its retiring members for judge in the new position which Congress has recently created in the Eighth Circuit. But another man had already been selected for the place, and the President explained the matter to them in the frankest matter. They move on to allow another delegation to urge the appointment of some one else for the circuit judgeship in Ohio, which Judge Day vacates to go on the Supreme Bench.

A handsome carriage, emblazoned with the German coat of arms, and containing the Secretary of State and the newly arrived Special Representative of Germany in the Venezuelan negotiations, Baron Speck von Sternberg, drove up at the south door. The Secretary and the Envoy were received in the President's private office, where formal greetings and expressions of good will were exchanged. This only occupied a few moments, and as President Roosevelt came back into his general office, Assistant Secretary Barnes appeared at his desk.

"Mr. Cortelyou's office is pretty well filled, Mr. President," he said, rather hesitatingly, as though loath to suggest another burden for his already overtaxed chief. But without a moment's hesitation the latter answered, "All right, Mr. Barnes, I'll come right out now," and followed him into the other room.

Mr. Cortelyou's office is the largest apartment in the executive building. In the centre of the floor, three men were standing, talking with each other as they waited. Beyond this group, a well-dressed colored man stood by the mantel.

and in front of him were three or four others, who seemed to have come in singly. On the sofa, against the west wall, was a party of ladies, and on the one near Mr. Barnes' desk was an old man and his wife, two younger women, and a small boy and girl who had come in with their Congressman to be introduced to the President. From one to the other of these groups the President passed rapidly, shaking hands with a warmth which is characteristic of him, and saying with a genuine ring in his voice to each one, "I am glad to see you," or "I am very glad that you came." The heartiness of the greeting and the personality which the President throws into his hand-shake always impresses those who meet him and makes the caller feel that in some way his Chief Executive takes a personal interest in him. The majority, when they had shaken hands, passed out, but the three men in the centre of the room held him for fifteen minutes in an earnest talk on the distribution of patronage.

THE ROOSEVELT FAMILY GROUP

From a photograph of the President's children, taken several years ago

Mr. Loeffler presently looked in again, "There are a good many waiting, Mr. President."

"All right, Captain, but I must see these men first," and he crossed over to where a couple of newspaper correspondents were waiting. The room had cleared by the time he had finished talking with them. For an hour or two longer, the President was busy with Senators and Representatives, who invariably came out from his office through Secretary Cortelyou's room, and stopped at the latter's desk to leave a memorandum of the matters they had placed before his Chief. By one o'clock, a long line of people were again waiting to shake hands with the head of the nation. Once more the President came from his office and went the rounds. The last to be received were a company of boys from a Baltimore school, and the President gave them the heartiest welcome. He repeated their names as he shook hands, and where he knew any of their families he told the lad of it.

"You all play football, I suppose?" Mr. Roosevelt asked.

"Yes we do," they responded as heartily, "we're a football team, and Tommy's our captain."

Tommy, a red-headed boy of ten, looking decidedly abashed, was shoved forward, and received the second hand-shake.

"Well, who plays left end? My boys Ted and Kermit play left end, but Ted can beat Kermit. He's bigger, you know," he added. The boys looked delighted at this information, and after saying a few more words to them they passed out, very proud and very happy over their visit.

By the time the boys had left Secretary Cortelyou's room, lunch hour, two o'clock, had arrived, and the wearied President hurried across the terrace to freshen up a bit before he went in to greet his luncheon guests. That day they were a prominent paper manufacturer of Massachusetts, a Senator from the same State, the Pension Commissioner, a newspaper correspondent, and three or four ladies, who made up the lunch party. It is one of the President's customs to entertain a great many different persons at luncheon, but it extends his working hours indefinitely. When lunch is over business is again taken up, and it is often four o'clock before the Executive is at liberty. Then he goes for a long horseback ride or a tramp across country. Sometimes Mrs. Roosevelt or one or more of the children accompany him; again, General Wood or some other intimate friend. Two secret service men always keep him in sight on these jaunts. Rain or shine, storm or heat, these outings are never missed. For his rides, Mr. Roosevelt wears a heavy tweed suit, "rough rider" hat, and brown leggings. He rides one of his great bay horses, Bleistein or Renown, and is followed by young Archie on his little calico pony—a miniature reproduction as to suit, leggins, and hat, of his distinguished sire. The ride or walk is often prolonged until dark overtakes them, or until it is time for dinner. Seldom is this meal without guests. Sometimes they are personal friends or house guests of the family, but more often they are men of affairs who have been bidden so that the President may have an opportunity to discuss weighty pending public questions. When the ladies retire from the table, the conversation is prolonged often until a late hour. Frequently, if the dinner guests depart in good season, other people wait by special appointment in the Red Room, and with these the President confers at length. Then he goes to his study, the historic room on the second floor, and has a quiet hour with his books or the current magazines. Between eleven and twelve o'clock he goes to bed.

Does he never tire? No day laborer lays on his pillow at night a wearier head. Fortunately the President has a vigorous body, and his habit of regular outdoor exercise gives him an enormous amount of reserve strength to draw upon to withstand the constant drain of his powers.

Every other Thursday during the winter season a large official dinner takes place at the White House. On alternate Thursdays, a State reception is held. President and Mrs. Roosevelt have really revolutionized Washington society. When Mrs. Roosevelt inaugurated "afternoon teas," she quietly suggested to her Cabinet ladies the advisability of making something more of their Wednesday receptions. In many unostentatious ways she raised the standard of the social life of the whole official circle. At the weekly musicales, Mrs. Roosevelt and Miss Alice usually receive the guests in the Green Parlor, and they are passed immediately into the East Room where they are seated for the programme, which lasts about an hour and a half. Refreshments are served in the long corridor, and the company, numbering from three to five hundred, wanders through the state apartments. The President mingles among his guests, stopping for a little chat with first one and then another. At one of these musicales, recently, he told the writer the following little incident. He was speaking about his family and laughing about his boys: "They are great little fellows and often 'down their father,'" said he. "On the night of the diplomatic dinner, I had just finished dressing for it when Mrs. Roosevelt said to me: 'The State dining room looks lovely. It's empty now; do run down and see it.' I did so, and was walking around the table admiring it, when suddenly two small boys dashed out from under it and grabbed me by the legs, shouting, 'Bear! father, bear!' Now, 'Bear' is a game which their mother absolutely prohibits in our household, unless my coat is off, and I'm prepared for the encounter; but this onslaught was so unexpected, and those boys had such a grip on me,

THROUGH SEALED TIBET

In the Presence of the Grand Lama...

SARAT CHANDRA DAS — WINE-DRINKING AT A MARRIAGE-FEAST — CHANDRA DAS ON HIS YAK IN TIBET — A TIBETAN WOMAN

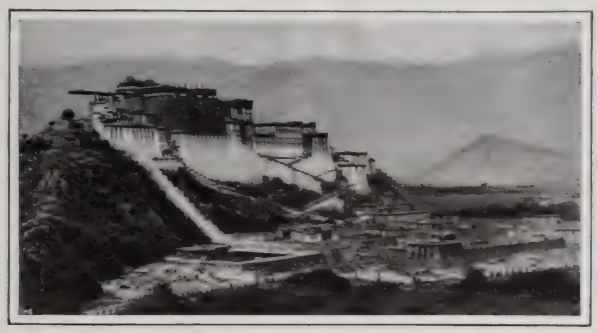
THE "Sealed Land" of Tibet and particularly its capital, Lhasa, the Forbidden City, has been the goal of many a daring explorer's ambition; and that a way might be opened to the seat of Lamaism has been the subject of missionary prayer and effort for centuries. Yet few Europeans have penetrated to Lhasa and lived to tell the tale. Readers of this journal are familiar with the tragic disappearance of Rev. Mr. Rijnharte, whose wife is even now seeking to find him in the "Sealed Land" that swallowed him up; they know how Landor, who attempted to enter Lhasa, came home at last, bent, aged and marred by torture; how Sven Hedin, the Swedish explorer and a late visitor to New York, was turned back before he reached the portals of the mystic city where the Dalai-Lama, or Grand Lama, who is ever a little child, dwells to be worshiped by the ignorant multitude as a fresh incarnation of Buddha. The Regent, who must be approved by the Chinese government, and two officials appointed by the Chinese government, are the real rulers of Tibet; the Dalai-Lama is nominal lord. When a Dalai-Lama reaches his majority, so the laws read, the Regent hands over to him the seals of office of both spiritual and temporal power. "Since the beginning of the present century no Dalai-Lama has reached majority, and the regency has been without interruption," writes Sarat Chandra Das, the Bengalese explorer, who has twice penetrated Tibet, who has visited and sojourned in Lhasa and drank tea in the presence of the Dalai (Grand) Lama. Ninety years ago, Thomas Manning, the only Englishman who ever entered Lhasa, had a like privilege. The lama he saw was seven years old, with "a beautiful and interesting face, and the simple, unaffected manners of a well educated, princely child." This is the description which Chandra Das gives of his visit to a later Grand Lama, in a most interesting book just published.*

The Grand Lama is a child with a bright and fair complexion, and rosy cheeks. His eyes are large and penetrating, the shape of his face remarkably Aryan, though somewhat marred by the obliquity of his eyes. The thinness of his person was probably due to the fatigue of the Court ceremonies and to the religious duties and ascetic observance of his estate. A yellow mitre covered his head, and its pendant lappets hid his ears; a yellow mantle draped his person, and he sat cross-legged with joined palms. His throne was supported by carved lions, and covered with silk scarfs. The State officers moved about with becoming gravity; there was the Kuchor Khanpo, with a bowl of holy water, colored yellow with saffron; the Censo-carrier, with a golden censer with three chains; the Solpon Chenpo, with a golden teapot; and other household officials. Two gold lamps, made in the shape of flower vases, burnt on either side of the throne. When all had been blessed and taken seats, the Solpon Chenpo poured tea in His Holiness' golden cup, and four assistants served the people present. Then grace was said, beginning with "Om, Ah, Hum," thrice repeated, and followed by "Never losing sight even for a moment of the Three Holies, making reverence ever to the Three Precious Ones," etc. Then we silently raised our cups and drank the tea, which was most deliciously perfumed. . . . The Solpon Chenpo put a golden dish full of rice before the Dalai Lama, and he touched it, and then it was divided among those present. Grace was again said, and His Holiness, in a low, indistinct tone, chanted a hymn, which was repeated by the assembled lamas in deep, grave tones. A venerable man rose, recited the many acts of mercy the Dalai-Lamas had vouchsafed Tibet, presented His Holiness with valuable gifts, made three prostrations and withdrew, followed by all of us. One of the chamberlains gave me two packets of blessed pills, and another tied a scrap of red silk around my neck—these are the usual returns the Grand Lama makes to pilgrims.

Chandra Das' approach to Lhasa is one of the most interesting portions of the book. He wore green goggles and the dress of a lama; a lama was his companion, and he had a powerful friend within the walls. He writes:

The country around was everywhere cultivated, and the barley, wheat and buckwheat were in many places a foot high. The road became alive with travelers, mostly grain-dealers or angel-carriers, on their way to the city with trains of yaks, ponies, mules and donkeys with jingling bells . . . The white city stood displayed before us at the end of an avenue of gnarled trees, the rays of the setting sun falling on its gilded domes. It was a superb sight, the like of which I have never seen. On our left was Potala, with its lofty buildings and gilt roofs before us, surrounded by a green meadow, lay the town, with its tower-like, whitewashed houses and Chinese buildings with roofs of blue-glazed tiles.

We passed Kunduling, residence of the Regent, and entered the city by the western gateway. My heart leaped with exultation as I now reached the goal of my journey—the far-famed city of Lhasa, the capital of Tibet. . . . The street on both sides was lined with native and Chinese shops; in front of each was a pyramidal structure, where juniper spines and dried leaves are burnt as offerings to the gods. . . . Silk fabrics, porcelain, and various kinds of brick-tea were exposed for sale.



THE POTALA PALACE OF THE GRAND LAMA

The next entry in his journal reads:

June 1. The holiest day of the year, the day of the Buddha's Nirvana. Incense was burnt on every hilltop, in every shrine, chapel, lamasery and house in or near Lhasa. Men, women and children hastened to the sacred shrine of Jo Khang, to do puja to the Lord Buddha and obtain his blessing. All carried in their hands bundles of incense-sticks, bowls of butter, and khatags (scarfs) of all sizes and qualities.

There are no caste restrictions in regard to marriage. The rich may bestow their daughters on the poor; the daughter of a poor man may become the bride of the proudest noble of the land; but such unions are infrequent. In event of a suitable match not being found, girls of royal blood are usually sent to convents. A bride is often older than her bridegroom. Marriage ceremonies are very similar to those in most Eastern countries. Polyandry is sanctioned. Chandra Das refers to the "custom of several brothers making one woman their common wife, to keep the ancestral property entire and undivided;" it is not extensively practised.

Funeral customs are peculiar. The soul is not supposed to quit the body when the heart stops and the breath ceases, save in rare cases of those who have attained such great holiness that the spirit may go at once to Paradise. It is sinful to dispose of the corpse immediately after death. On the fourth day a lama, closeted with the body, slits the skull that the soul may pass out, receiving in return a cow, yak or other gift. In due state, the remains are borne to the cemetery, and there a lama dissects it, flinging the pieces to the vultures.

Among amusements of the people may be counted wrestling, archery, polo, foot and pony races. New Year celebration is Tibet's greatest festival. At Lhasa, the State begins arrangements for the New Year feast a month beforehand. The Grand Lama's kitchen, where stoves are ornamented with precious stones and metals, and where the utensils are of solid gold, is a busy scene, a corps of lamas, their mouths covered with eight thicknesses of fine silk that their breath may not pollute the sacred food, prepare dainties for the Grand Lama. All the butter and milk used here, is obtained from the great herd of sacred yaks belonging to the lama, which herd the people salute as it passes, taking off their hats and kotowing. The Grand Lama holds a levee on New Year's Day, refreshments are served, and presents bestowed—particularly on His Holiness.

In this book, from which by courtesy of the publishers, we reproduce pictures as well as facts, the veil is lifted for the first time from Lhasa as it is today. Before Chandra Das left Tibet, the little Grand Lama was dead of small-pox, it was said. Another child sits on the throne supported by the lions, and people worship him.

that before I knew it I was down upon the floor in a mad tumble. When the fight was over, the father was so badly worsted that he had to rush back upstairs and change his coat before he could receive his diplomatic guests."

Sunday is always a quiet day at the White House. No official work is transacted, and all honor the sacredness of the day. It is the President's invariable custom to attend service at the Dutch Reform Church, Sabbath mornings. Sunday evenings are spent with his family in the library on the second floor of the White House. As far as possible, he makes the day one of rest and worship.

Helped by a Talmage Sermon

I desire to let the many of your readers know what one of Dr. T. DeWitt Talmage's sermons has done for me. The sermon will be found in the issue of February 10, 1922. The theme is, "Every-day Religion." Text, I. Corinthians 10:31: "Whether, therefore ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God." That sermon, for many days, proved a spiritual feast for my hungry soul. There was so much in it for me, and I reread it more than a dozen times before I became satisfied. Though I had striven for more than eighteen years to follow very closely my Lord and Master, still there never came a time during those years in which I could speak of entire consecration. I kept on reading that sermon until I yielded everything to God, and covenanted to him that I would spend all the powers that he would give, in glorifying him on earth. Since then, I have gone forth, and I am still going, doing voluntary work for God and his kingdom. I meet with hindrances, but they only serve as an impulse to make me cling more firmly to the Cross of Christ.

Many were the sermons that I read from the pen of the "Sainted Doctor," and they gave me quite a deal of spiritual strength; but the one that is here mentioned, was the most effacacious.

As to Senator-Elect Smoot

IT is evident, from the tone of the Mormon press, that the gathering "storm of public opinion" adverse to the admission of the Mormon Apostle, Reed Smoot, to the United States Senate, is regarded with qualms and forebodings. One of these organic publications, The Saints' Herald, representing the "Reorganized Church of Latter Day Saints," devotes nearly two full pages to a reply to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S editorial comments on the Smoot case. It reminds us that there are Gentiles as well as Mormons in Utah; that religious belief does not exclude a man from office, if he is legally elected; that Mr. Smoot is not a polygamist; that, if permitted to take his seat, he would be powerless to enact hurtful laws; that, inadvertently or by design, the framer of the Anti-Polygamy Act, and the Enabling Act, under which Utah attained Statehood, left a peculiar loophole open, which made evasion of the prohibition of polygamy a comparatively easy matter, and that this was done for some undisclosed political purpose.

Now, all this does not affect, in the remotest sense, the points raised by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. We have never charged Senator-elect Smoot with being a polygamist, though we understand that such a charge has been made by citizens of his own State, who have embodied the allegation in a protest to the Senate Elections Committee. Nor have we urged that he should be rejected because of his religion. To be a Mormon is one thing; but to be a Mormon Apostle, and member of a secret oath-bound council—the Apostolic Quorum of the Mormon Church—is quite another matter. That Council represents all there is in Mormonism that is antagonistic to our institutions and national interests. Its members are sworn to obey the mandates of the Mormon hierarchy in all things—an obligation which is in direct conflict with the duty of an American citizen. One of the protests before the Senate, charges that the apostolic oath binds the Apostle and his descendants "to avenge upon the Government of the United States" the death of the Mormon prophet many years ago, and "never to rest until that vengeance is an accomplished fact." How does such an oath (if this charge be true) sound to patriotic Americans? The Salt Lake Ministerial Association, in its protest to the Senate, also puts this part of the indictment in very plain terms, thus:

> An Apostle of the Mormon Church is not a citizen, as he has foresworn his allegiance and given it to another temporal government—the Mormon Church. . . . To give to such, a seat in the Senate of the United States, is to open the citadel of our liberties to our enemies.

Our Mormon contemporary has evidently misapprehended the real character of the case against Senator-elect Smoot, and it has equally misunderstood the attitude of the American people. They object, not to the Mormon, but to the Mormon Apostle, who is, by virtue of his office, one of the custodians of the secret records of polygamous marriages, which are kept beyond legal control. They recognize in him the personal candidate of the Mormon hierarchy. This is the basis of the protest filed by the Interdenominational Council of Women of the United States with the Senate Committee, and it also forms the groundwork of other protests. None of the protestants, save those from Mr. Smoot's own State, have charged him with polygamy. These citizens of Utah may be mistaken; or they may only mean that he is living "in evasion" of the Anti-Polygamy Law and the Enabling Act. They have demanded the production of the secret records of polygamous marriages in Court. Will the Apostolate grant this demand and throw the record open to the light of day? If the charge were sustained, it would supersede all others, and would probably settle the case. If unsustained, it would be a vindication, which, to be complete, would only require the further proof that Apostle Smoot had never taken any oath antagonistic to the general government. It is to his interest that his friends should bring these matters to the light.

As to the point raised by The Saints' Herald, concerning the evasive interpretation of the Enabling Act, encouraging practical polygamy without the marriage ceremony, we believe the verdict in decent communities everywhere would be that the evasion was several degrees blacker and more repulsive than the original offense. But the existence of such a condition of affairs in Utah, which our contemporary admits, does not shift the responsibility from the Mormon Church. Who connive at such evasion and foster such practices, if not the Mormon Council and its apostles? It must be their interpretation of the law which encourages such conditions.

If polygamy is ever to be stamped out, as the American people desire it should be, and as Congress intended, a more specific and comprehensive law will be needed. Such a law is even now being talked of and strongly urged. It is true, men cannot be made moral by statute; but it ought to be possible to enact a law that could not be overridden and set at defiance to the extent that now prevails in Utah, with reference to the law prohibiting plural marriages.

A Practical Church

IT used to be a fact that business men looked upon a college graduate as the most unpromising candidate for a business career It was partly owing, no doubt, to the graduate's unwillingness to begin at the foot of the ladder and go up from the bottom; but it was very largely due to the impression that college men were theorists, with vague or unpractical ideas of life; with a lot of learning in their heads that must be unlearned before anything could be accomplished.

There has been a change of late years. Colleges and universities are beginning to be looked to as centres of thought and research, not as mills to turn out so many machines ready-made. The work done is widely appreciated and is telling immensely on the progress of the world. But the colleges had to change their methods; give the young men less of theory and more of facts; the facts of natural science, the facts of history, the facts of political philosophy, the facts of sociology; had to teach men to think, and prepare them to act.

The case is almost parallel to that of the church. A practical world has very often looked upon Christianity as unpractical and visionary; spending too much time on its mountain-tops, instead of going down into the plains below and casting out devils, healing the sick and lifting the fallen. There has been too much truth in the indictment; the mint, the anise and the cummin of theological abstractions have been tithed regularly enough, but the weightier matters of justice and peace and neighborly love have been neglected. Let us rejoice that a change has come in this generation. The church is preaching these practical things as never before, and demanding them as proof of genuine Christianity.

It is a movement of the greatest promise for the Kingdom of Christ, and as it grows to be everywhere accepted as the true expression of the Gospel, the world will recognize the religion of Jesus Christ as the power that shall save the race.

Large or Small Families

A GOOD deal of attention has been given recently to the decrease in the size of American families. If any reader happen to belong to a family that came over in the Mayflower, or soon after that famous ship, and if that family have its genealogy all kept and properly brought down to date, he or she may be edified by reading the names of his ancestors. Families number eight, ten, twelve, and fourteen children as a rule. Jerusha, Samuel, John, Alexander, Sarah, Rebecca, Clarissa, Mary, William, the names come on in regular order, about two years apart. In those simple, early days, large families were brought up on very little money, and luxuries were unknown. If there was enough to eat, a roaring fire on the hearth, and shoes for the children's feet, the parents were satisfied. Hard by one another stood schoolhouse and church, and the boys and girls went to both, for plain living and high thinking accompanied each other in the early history of our country, and in piety and intelligence the men and women of colonial times were reared. Large families did not go out of fashion till long after the Revolution.

It is only as a feature of our modern civilization that the student of sociology sounds a warning note, looking at the one, the two, or the three children which compose the family of the average well-to-do American now.

As life has grown less simple and more costly, as artificial wants have multiplied, and education grown more elaborate, many people have felt that they could not support more than a child or two. It is not uncommon for young people in marrying to determine, that if they can help themselves, they will have no children at all. The charms of infancy, the prattle of little voices, and the patter of little feet, weigh very light in the balance, when on the other scale are put freedom to go and come, opportunity to wear pretty dresses, and immunity from domestic cares. We are speaking of city life, where people often dwell in flats, and take their meals in restaurants, a style quite different from our accepted home ideal, a style into which little children cannot easily fit.

In our country districts we get much nearer the true American ideal; and we still find there the larger family group, with the rosy-cheeked girls and the sturdy boys who are the nation's hope and true wealth. The towns show the large family in the foreign quarter, and among the very poor. But we do not associate poverty with the farm, where the house is big and roomy, the barns are filled with provender, and the acreage yields enough for the family wants. Thrift and comfort distinguish our beautiful farmsteads, and there our young people grow up in honor and integrity and have good times together.

A young girl said to us the other day, "I am glad now there are so many of us, for we have learned self-denial and generosity in our large household. When we have no help, my brothers (men grown), take hold. We have splendid times on birthdays and holidays; we have a good many common interests, and when we sit down at our long table when the day's work is done, we have fun and jests and a very happy hour together."

This, to be quite fair, must be said on the other side. When a man has a small fixed income, or a salary that will probably not increase with the years, he naturally wishes to lay something aside for the future. It is in his power to do this, and to thoroughly educate one child or two children, giving it or them advantages that cannot be spread over a dozen, and, when the time comes for a start in life, he may be able to give the smaller number the better send-off.

What do you think, gentle reader? Write to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and let us know.

HIGH ENDORSEMENT

OUR readers, who have on their book-shelves The Illustrated Story of the Hall of Fame, will doubtless be interested in the following expressions of opinion regarding that work. The first is from a lady, who, as a representative of the Daughters of the American Revolution, took prominent part in the Dedication Ceremonies of the Hall of Fame, being one of the group selected to unveil the statue of Daniel Webster:

DR. LOUIS KLOSCH—DEAR SIR:—The Illustrated Story of the Hall of Fame proves valuable and very interesting, and you deserve great credit for your enterprise and patriotism. The illustrations are beautifully brought out.

Very truly yours,
M MARGARETTA (MRS. DANIEL) MANNING.

Writers of these letters served as judges in the selection of names to be inscribed in the Hall of Fame:

DR. LOUIS KLOPSCH—DEAR SIR:—Your handsome and valuable volume in commemoration of the Hall of Fame, has recently come to hand. Such a work ought to have a definite result in stimulating a spirit of patriotic loyalty, and of arousing in the minds of readers, particularly the young, a zeal to emulate the deeds of those whose careers are so admirably outlined by Dr. Banks. Yours very truly,

CHARLES M. ANDREWS,
Professor of History, Bryn Mawr.

DR. LOUIS KLOPSCH—DEAR SIR:—I am under great obligations to you for sending me The Illustrated Story of the Hall of Fame, by Dr. Louis Albert Banks, and appreciate the kindness of the donor. It contains much interesting history and also a great deal of contemporaneous intelligent opinion in respect to the worthiest American characters.

Yours very cordially, ANSON D. MORSE.

DR. LOUIS KLOPSCH—DEAR SIR:—I beg to acknowledge receipt of The Illustrated Story of the Hall of Fame. Please accept my thanks for your courtesy. I was much interested in the matter, and the book will serve not only to remind me of the episode of the contest, but will be read with unusual interest and profit. It is a superb volume in its make-up, a fitting sketch of the first "battle" and the scheme it writes about. Yours gratefully, CHARLES N. POTTER,
Chief Justice Supreme Court of Wyoming

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

The Alaska Boundary

WITH the ratification of the treaty between our Government and that of Great Britain, for the settlement of the points in dispute in reference to the Alaska boundary, a cry has been raised that American interests have been betrayed. In Canada, too, there are many who are dissatisfied with the treaty. The two facts, taken together, imply that the treaty is fair, since the next best thing to its satisfying both parties, is that it offends both. It provides that six commissioners, three to be appointed by the United States and three by Great Britain, shall examine the questions at issue, and report upon them. This differs from a court of arbitration, in that the numbers on each side being equal, there is no seventh member to give the final decision. It is a court for the amicable discussion of the points involved, and it can render a united report only, if either side can present evidence which shall convince the judges on the other side of the justice of its claims. The constitution of the court is thus a stage on the friendly side of arbitration; and indicates a hope on both sides that the judges will approach the subject with open minds, intent only on justice being done. A glance at the map will show how the dispute has arisen. The main bulk of the huge territory of Alaska is north of the sixtieth parallel of north latitude. South of that, there is a strip of coast stretching to about latitude fifty-five, which is part of Alaska. The treaty between Russia and Great Britain, limiting the width of this strip, was drawn very loosely, neither of the two Powers regarding the land as of any value. It was roughly defined as thirty miles wide, and the question now arises whether the western line, from which the thirty miles is to be measured eastward, follows the indentations of the coast, or whether it is a straight line crossing gulfs and inlets. If it is the former, as our Government contends, some regions rich in gold will fall to our possession; if the latter, as Canada contends, not only will those regions fall to Canada, but she will also have the head waters of the Lynn Channel, which would give her access to the sea. The judges appointed by President Roosevelt are Secretary Root, and Senators Turner and Lodge. That both they and the British judges will, at the outset, be predisposed in favor of the claims of their respective countries, is only natural; but neither side is pledged to decide according to the prepossessions. It is a question of the interpretation of phrases, and of matters of geography, which should be easily settled, if they will make their maxim the rule laid down by the ancient lawgiver.

That which is altogether just shalt thou follow, that thou mayest live, and inherit the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee (Deut. 16: 20).

THE SUMMIT OF THE WHITE PASS—THE ANGLO-AMERICAN BOUNDARY

Checks on Immigration

The new immigration law, which has passed both houses of Congress, excludes persons from this country who, for various causes, are undesirable. It is much more stringent than the law now in force. The classes excluded from admission are idiots, insane persons, epileptics, and persons who have been insane within five years previous; paupers, persons likely to become a public charge, persons afflicted with a loathsome, dangerous, or contagious disease; persons who have been convicted of crime or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, polygamists, anarchists, or persons who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of all government or the assassination of public officials; women of bad repute and persons who attempt to bring in such women, and persons whose tickets or passage is paid for with the money of another or who are assisted by others to come. It is made unlawful to assist or encourage immigration of aliens by a promise of employment by advertisement in a foreign country, and any alien coming in consequence of such advertisement shall be treated as coming under a promise or agreement. Any person belonging to any of the classes indicated may be deported at any time within two years, and be sent back to the country from which they came at the expense of the Steamship Company which brought them. Such checks are necessary for our own public welfare; but happily, not even those people whom we feel it our duty to exclude, are debarred from entering Christ's Kingdom, and we are authorized to invite them.

Go out quickly into the streets and lanes of the city and bring in hither the poor and the maimed and the halt and the blind (Luke 14: 21).

Settled by a Wedding

A judge and jury in a court in Long Island City, N. Y., were relieved of a painful duty at the last moment a few days ago. They had been engaged for three days in the trial of a prominent citizen for charges involving breach of promise of marriage. Many witnesses had been examined, and the lawyers on both sides had made eloquent speeches. The judge had charged the jury, and the jurors had retired to consider their verdict. The fathers of the plaintiff and defendant, both men well known in local political circles, went out into the corridor to await the result. While they were there a friend of both men made a whispered suggestion to each, and brought them together. There was a hurried consultation, and then the defendant's father went into court and spoke to his son. The son sought the plaintiff and had a few minutes conversation with her. The two families were soon gathered in one of the court rooms, and shortly afterwards returned to court just as the jury entered with their verdict. Before the clerk could receive it, the judge informed the jurors that they were discharged. The plaintiff had married the defendant while they were deciding, and the marriage was a bar to further proceedings. He congratulated the jurors and the newly married couple on the close of the trial. It may be hoped the future will justify the congratulations, though it is not a very propitious beginning to married life. It was, however, satisfactory in putting an end to the trial. All the parties would be thankful for that result. How devoutly thankful in the judgment at the last great day will those be who find that judgment against them is averted because in their life they entered into union with Christ, of which marriage is a type.

There is therefore now no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit (Rom. 8: 1).

Challenged Her Own Verdict

A curious action has just been tried and decided by the Appellate Court of New York. It was brought by a woman to secure dower rights in the estate of a citizen who died recently. She was formerly his wife, but had sued for divorce, and obtained a decree in her favor, about seven years ago. She showed, in her suit for dower, that the decree had been wrongfully granted, and was in fact invalid. The inference from this was that she was legally the wife of the deceased at his death, although she had not been living with him, and had in all respects acted as an unmarried woman. The decision of the court was against her claim. The judges held that whether the decree of divorce was or was not valid, she had sought it, obtained it, and taken advantage of it, thus treating it as valid. She could not now, therefore, when her interests were opposed to the decree, claim that it was invalid. It was against public policy for a person to rest at one time on a decision, and at another time repudiate it, according as pecuniary interest dictated. Her own conduct pledged her to the stand she had taken, and she must abide by it. It would be unreasonable to allow her to claim a relationship here, that she was anxious to renounce during her husband's lifetime. That fact should be borne in mind by people who hope to be acknowledged as Christians when Christ comes in glory, but are not willing to bear his name now.

Whosoever shall be ashamed of me and my words, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed, when he shall come in his own glory (Luke 9: 26).

Newly-Found Relatives

A poor old shoemaker died recently in the northern district of New York. He had lived there for twenty-five years, and during all that time, the neighbors say, no relative had ever been to see him. None came during his illness, and it was the hands of neighbors that ministered to his wants and closed his eyes in death. After his death, an iron chest was found covered with rags and old carpets, in his wretched room. The news of the finding of the chest spread, and, in a few days, more than twenty persons claiming to be cousins, or nephews, or nieces, clamored for the privilege of burying the old man and being acknowledged as his heirs. The public administrator took possession of the effects, including the iron chest, and turned all the claimants over to the courts. The chest itself could not be opened, and will require the services of an expert locksmith to get at its contents. What it contains no one knows, but the claimants are already engaging lawyers to prosecute their claims to a share of its contents. They must produce legal proof of relationship now: if some one of them had furnished natural proof of kinship when the old man needed the services of a kinsman, he might have inherited without trouble under a will. There are some who will be tested in this way when they appear before Christ.

Depart from me . . . for I was sick and ye visited me not Matt. 25: 41-43).

Changed by the River

A remarkable claim on a considerable tract of land has been before the law courts of Kansas City, Mo., for some time. It originally belonged, with other adjoining land, to a Wyandotte Indian, whose title gave him all the land "to the river bank." In 1867 the Missouri River changed its course, cutting off about eighty-five acres from the whole. The Indian, thinking that the river might eventually swallow up all his holding, was easily persuaded to sell the remainder. Extensive business houses were built upon it and it is now immensely valuable. A few years ago the river reverted to its original channel, thus restoring the eighty-five acres to the mainland. The owners of the land promptly took possession of the area given back by the river and extended their buildings upon it, at the same time taking protective measures against any future depredations by the river. The heirs of the Indian, however, believe that they ought to benefit by the restitution made by the river, and contend that as the land belonged to their ancestor, and was never sold by him, the present holders have no right to it. The lower courts have decided in their favor, but the case has been appealed. The question to be decided appears to be, whether the Indian lost his ownership of the land when it was submerged. The lower court seems to have thought that it belonged to him while it was under water and is still his now that it has reappeared. The question is an important one for his heirs: to him personally, being dead, it is of infinitely less moment than the one of his having so lived as to be entitled to an inheritance in the Kingdom of God.

The world passeth away and the lust thereof: but he that doeth the will of God abideth forever (I. John 2: 17).

BRIEF NOTES

We grieve to learn that Mr. Ira D. Sankey's health has again broken down. He is suffering from nervous prostration and from an affection of the eyes, which, though somewhat relieved by an operation he has undergone, still leaves him almost sightless.

A bill intended to make Sunday baseball games legal in Indiana, has been defeated in the State Senate by one man's action. He refrained from voting for Sunday baseball because of a pledge given to his wife.

THE ANCIENT TOWN OF VASA, FINLAND, WHICH DR. KLOPSCH WILL PROBABLY VISIT DURING HIS TOUR

RUSSIA'S PLAN to FIGHT the FAMINE

Great Relief Works Projected, but the Sufferers Must be Kept Alive in the Meanwhile

ALTHOUGH the dark cloud of famine and death still hangs over Finland, it is this week relieved by a gleam of sunshine that gives promise of a brighter day at hand. Everywhere the news has gone abroad in Finland that the Czar, moved by the benevolent attitude of America toward the suffering Finnish peasants, and the solicitude displayed by the American gifts, has personally interested himself in coming to the relief of the afflicted people. This is confirmed by the intelligence from St. Petersburg (mentioned in these pages last week), that extensive relief works will shortly be started by order of the imperial government. These works will include the proposed Idensalmi-Kajana railway, to cost $700,000, and the Uleaborg-Tornea railway, to cost $300,000. In addition to these, a loan of $2,000,000 for still further railroad construction, is to be arranged, and a bank, with $800,000 capital, will be established, which will make loans to the Finnish farmers. These are all projects that have their origin in the imperial desire to aid the impoverished and starving Finlanders.

While this vast relief scheme, when it is fairly in operation, will doubtless employ practically all the able-bodied men in the famine districts, and will be the means of bringing food and comfort to multitudes, it is probable that many weeks will elapse before the relief becomes a reality. Not until after the melting of the snows and the subsidence of the spring floods, can any work of the nature contemplated be started on an extended scale. During the intervening weeks, the many committees in the interior, whose members are personally conducting the relief work among the sufferers, must depend upon the benevolence of those who are supplying them, through the Helsingfors Committee, with the food necessary to sustain life.

Dr. Klopsch, who is now making a tour of the famine provinces, has visited a number of towns and villages in the interior, and will doubtless have much of interest to report. His reception everywhere has been remarkably cordial, and expressions of deep gratitude for American aid greeted him at every place where he visited. The Central Relief Committee at Helsingfors also voted its heartfelt thanks to the American people for the generosity to Finland in its time of need. The contributions to the relief work, which were sent through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, were distributed over a wide field of destitution and produced excellent results.

Many different organizations throughout the United States are still actively pushing forward the relief work in behalf of Finland and Sweden. The Minnesota House of Representatives has passed a bill appropriating $5,000 for the work, and the Illinois House of Representatives has done likewise. In many parts of the West, and even in New York State, thousands of carloads of supplies are being forwarded to the sufferers in Sweden.

The Finnish Fair in New York City netted nearly $1,000, which is to be sent to local committees at Pietisjarvella, Nurmeksesse, Ubo, Junassa, Enossa, North Kayala, and other places.

Among the many hundreds of letters received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during the week, containing contributions for the Famine Fund, were the following:

The Christian Herald:—Enclosed, I have the pleasure to hand you draft for $1,000 for the famine sufferers in Finland, from the Danish Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, collected among its members and congregations. As treasurer of this church, I send the money to you, feeling confident it will come into the right hands and be used where it is needest most.

J. S. FAABORG,
Treasurer, Danish Evan. Luth. Church in America.

WINDER, GA.

Please find enclosed one dollar order for the famine fund. May God bless you in the noble work. Wish I could do more.

MRS. M. O. B.

HIGGANVIN, CONN.

Enclosed, find $1 for Finland Famine Fund. May the relief work continue and the helpers be blessed, is the prayer of one who gladly adds this small amount for the good work.

A FRIEND.

DOUGLAS, MAN., CAN.

Enclosed herewith, please find money-order $2, my small contribution to the Finland Famine Fund. I am pleased to notice that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is not only Christian in name but in deed, and trust that all who are able will assist in the Christian work you have in hand.

MRS. A. C. S.

MONMOUTH, ORE.

Enclosed, please find one dollar for the sufferers of Scandinavia. This is from my wife. When she read of the fearful suffering of the Christians of those countries, she said she would get along without a certain necessary, and give the dollar where it was more needed.

C. W. S.

RACINE, WIS.

I have already sent in my contribution to the Finland Famine Fund, about two weeks ago, but this last week I thought I would ask some of my girl friends if they would not like to contribute some, and the result was that they more than filled the blank, and I herewith send a list of names and amounts contributed ($7.50).

MISS M. IVERSEN.

A letter from Chaplain T. T. Taliaferro, of the Kentucky Penitentiary, at Frankfort, Ky., encloses $5 for the Finland sufferers, and says:

This was a movement of the prisoners at the meeting of the Christian Endeavor Society last Sunday. The Colored Christian Endeavor, which meets separately from the white, said they wanted to have a hand in this matter, so I told them they could take their contribution next Sunday morning.

This is the prisoners' letter:

We, the following prisoners in the Frankfort, Ky., penitentiary, desire to contribute our little mite to the Finland Famine Fund. Our hearts are touched at the thought of these starving people, and our prison fare will be sweeter and our daily toil lighter, by reason of helping you save some lives.

MILKING TIME ON A LAPP REINDEER FARM

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.

Enclosed $10 for the starving Finlanders: $5 for Samuel A. Hening, and $5 for the writer. The Finlanders are truly a noble people, as any one may see who reads their remarkable national epic poem, the Kalevala. America is indebted to them and to the Kalevala for its only true epic Hiawatha. Then, it seems, we should aid them. They seem to me the noblest of Turanian peoples, with the possible exception of the North American Indian.

L. E. SMITH.

HARRIS, CALIF.

Accept this small contribution ($3) for Finland's destitute people. We wish it was many times as great, but the little collection is from poor, but not destitute people, and the poor can sympathize with the poor.

The following letter was sent to J. H. Jasberg, Secretary of the Finnish Central Relief Committee of the United States, by the writer's sister, from West Duluth, Minn.:

WALIKOSKI, KERASJOKI, HAPARANTA, SWEDEN.

Dear Sister: We have received great quantities of supplies, which have been sent from Southern Sweden, England and from America. Several hundred carloads of hay and straw for the beasts of labor, and many other kinds of provisions, such as barley, oats, potatoes, rye, rice, flour and clothing.

We therefore extend many thousand thanks to Almighty God for our unknown friends and benefactors, and we feel much relieved by the thought that God has turned their eyes and hearts towards us, we being so defenseless. But though we are worldly, and in such helpless condition, we hope and believe that in the home of our Heavenly Father there will be no want of either defense or provisions, and that we shall be provided with such goods as will never become exhausted by either moths or rust, if we obey His commands.

I will say that the famine still surrounds us on every side. All along the valley of Tornio, up to Lapland, the people and beasts of burden are suffering together.

In bidding you good-bye, I do it in the hope that through all the struggles in faith, we shall reach the eternal home.

ISACK WILHELM PERTTU.

In a recent letter from Lulea, Sweden, a correspondent of the Chicago Tribune gives a very comprehensive statement of the condition of that country, where famine has been raging for months past. We quote:

In eighteen small divisions of the government district known as Norbotten's Lan, three districts must have 9,180 tons of hay if the remaining stock is to be kept alive until the close of May. Seventeen small towns must have 1,200 tons of flour. Eleven towns call for 881 tons of straw, with which to save their stock. Nine districts ask for 98 tons of oil-cake, so that they can mix it with the leaves of birch trees, and feed it to cattle, as the only available fodder until grass appears the middle of next June. The town and parish of Ofver Kalix are "only on the edge of the land of snow and ice." The town is but a short drive from a railway terminal, yet the residents have already appealed for 250 tons of flour, 880 tons of hay, 220 tons of straw, 11 tons of oilcake, 40 tons of oats, and 66 tons of fodder meal. These allow only the scantiest meals for human beings and for live stock.

When the winter is ended, a very large amount of seed, grain and vegetables will be required to make another harvest possible, however favorable may be the summer season. Already the Swedish Government is securing pledges of seed, grain and vegetables from certain districts of Southern Sweden, where, thanks to the elevation of the land, the products are such as will grow to maturity within the three months' summer of the Northland. At Lulea, Karl J. Bergstrom, the Governor of the Lan, is working day and night in co-operation with the Central Relief Committee in Stockholm. The Governor extended his heartfelt thanks to the Americans that are contributing relief.

All contributions for the Famine sufferers in Finland, and also for those in Sweden, should be addressed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York. Contributors are requested to state clearly in their letters whether their gifts are for Finland or for Sweden. All will be acknowledged in these columns and will be duly cabled to the authorized committee in Helsingfors, the other to the Relief Committee at Stockholm.

A MISSIONARY TOUR WITH PAUL

:: QUARTERLY REVIEW ::

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR MARCH 29

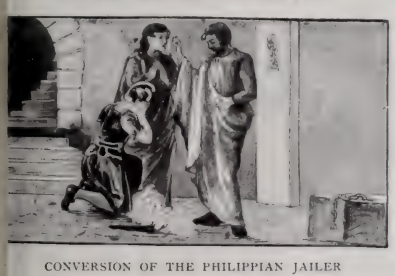
By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT.—MATT. 28: 20. LO, I AM WITH YOU ALWAY, EVEN UNTO THE END OF THE WORLD.

WE begin with Paul and Silas at Philippi, in prison, their feet fast in the stocks, while their unfettered faith bursts forth in songs of love and praise to God. God's answer comes back in an earthquake, by which the prison doors are opened. One prisoner is released—the jailer himself. He accepts Christ as his Saviour, and is released from the bondage of sin. He begins at once the exercise of Christian charity by washing the bleeding backs of Paul and Silas, and setting food before them. Paul and Silas might depart, the prison doors being open, but they demand release from the authorities who placed them there. This being done, they depart for Thessalonica, thirty miles distant.

BEREANS STUDYING THE SCRIPTURES

A MESSENGER FROM GOD TO PAUL



CONVERSION OF THE PHILIPPIAN JAILER

But Paul does not cast off his friends in Philippi, Lydia and her household, the jailer and his household, and other converts. He holds them dear, and they likewise think of him, and sometimes send him gifts of money out of regard for his health and welfare. Ten years later, when a prisoner in Rome, in response to such a gift, he writes them a letter which is carried back to Philippi by Epaphroditus, who had brought the gift of money. That letter to the Philippians has been a blessing to the world ever since.

Going back to the time when Paul and Silas left Philippi, we go with them to Thessalonica, and abide with them in the house of Jason, Paul's kinsman, during the three weeks they spend there. We listen to Paul on three successive Sabbath days, as he preaches Christ in the synagogue of the Jews. We go with him at other times as he talks to the Greeks. Among the Greeks he gathers converts, a multitude of them, some of them men and women of distinction. We find ourselves among those who were dragged out of the house of Jason by the mob, incited by the Jews. We see money collected of Jason by the magistrates as surety that he will secure the departure of Paul and Silas from Thessalonica.

We follow on after them to Berea, a place of refuge among the hills. We go into the synagogue of the Jews with Paul, and hear him preach Christ. How different the result compared with Thessalonica, for the people hear him gladly, and search their Scripture rolls to verify the words of Paul concerning the expected Messiah. But there is an interruption to this daily study, when the turbulent mob surges in from Thessalonica. We remain in Berea with Silas and Timothy, while Paul takes his departure for Athens.

We go to Corinth to meet Paul on his return from Athens. We listen to him as he tells of finding Athens wholly given over to idols. One vulnerable point he reports that he found, an altar "to an Unknown God," which had given occasion to proclaim the invisible, true and living God, the God not made with hands. Two names he mentions with delight as converts to Jesus, Dionysius, the Areopagite, and a woman named Damaris.

We go with Paul back to Corinth, and visit him in the house of Aquila and Priscilla, where he abides, and works with them at tent-making. We listen to him as he talks, while he works, of Jesus, and the wonderful way in which, when a persecutor, he was led to become Christ's follower. We could never grow tired of the story, though we heard it many times during the year and six months of our stay in Corinth. On Sabbath days we go to the synagogue of the Jews, and hear Paul preach about Jesus. Great is the excitement when Crispus, the leader of the synagogue, becomes a follower of Jesus. A tumult arises when many others do so, and it is deemed expedient by Paul to remove his preaching services from the synagogue to the home of Justus, alongside the synagogue. We note the brave bearing of Paul, and discover the secret: the Lord had spoken to Paul by a vision, saying, "Be not afraid, but speak, and hold not thy peace, for I am with thee, and no man shall set on thee to hurt thee: for I have much people in this city."

One day we come upon Paul and Silas and Timotheus, engaged in writing a letter to the Christians in Thessalonica. Before that time, we had thought only of the angry mob, but were glad to learn that a noble church had been established there, which would, in time, become a centre for sending the Gospel into regions near and far.

We come with Paul to take up a residence in Ephesus. Aquila and Priscilla are of our company, for they have decided to remove their home from Corinth that they might still be with Paul. We hear Paul preach only a few times in Ephesus before he takes his departure for Jerusalem, that he may fulfil a vow which he had made. The lonely days of waiting for his return are enlivened by the coming of a great teacher named Apollos, who is even more eloquent than Paul. Sitting with Aquila and Priscilla in the synagogue we listen to Apollos, and are amazed that in his teachings he has nothing to say about the Holy Spirit. Aquila and Priscilla invited Apollos to their home, that they may impart to him what they have learned about the Holy Spirit from Paul. The glad day has now come that brings Paul back to Ephesus. He has been absent many weeks, having gone not only to Jerusalem, but also to Antioch, to visit the Christians there, and tell them of the spread of the Gospel in other cities. He has also crossed the mountains and visited the Christians in Derbe, Lystra and Iconium. Wonderful days follow Paul's return to Ephesus. Those who have been brought to Christ through the preaching of Apollos need to be taught concerning the Holy Spirit. A Pentecost comes upon the followers of Christ in Ephesus, as in Jerusalem many years before, and they, too, speak with every man in his own language about Jesus. Paul himself is endued with an unusual gift of the Spirit, for the sick are healed, when handkerchiefs and aprons are brought from Paul to them. It seems to us as though the whole city will be brought to Christ. But we have not measured right the hold that yonder great idol of Diana has upon the Ephesian heart. Neither have we reckoned with the commercial spirit of the silversmiths, who see their trade is in peril. From a decreasing business as many as they can retain from losses to Jesus.

We see Paul stop amid the stir to write a letter to the Church in Corinth. This letter was inspired in the unknown world had been brought into that Pauline life, arisen had come the Jewish and Greek members of the church concerning the eating of idol meats. We are glad with them upon which it brought back that has better had settled the difficulty, establishing the good of others as the principle by which all differences should be adjusted.

Now we come to a fatal scene in Ephesus, when the Christians make a bonfire of the books which have been their greatest treasures as worshipers of Diana. It is a solemn scene, and in great contrast to the riot which the silversmiths had provoked, a riot that might have resulted in the degradation of Ephesus by the Roman powers, had it not been for the tactful management of the wise town-clerk.

We are not sorry to leave Ephesus with Paul, though we have been with him there for three years. In his love for his brave and determined converts in Ephesus, four years afterwards he writes them a letter when in prison in Rome.

APOLLOS INSTRUCTED BY AQUILA AND PRISCILLA

THE CORINTHIANS RECEIVING PAUL'S LETTER

ANSWERED PRAYERS

ARTHUR WILLIAMS, Magnolia, Minn., writes:

I am a cripple; and none but such as I can appreciate my position, nor can they know how much grace it requires to live a cheerful life under such affliction. Yet my blessed Heavenly Father helps me so much when I go to him in prayer that I am happy. So contented, indeed, am I, that if to forsake my Lord were the alternative, I can truly and joyously exclaim:

The road that I travel is rugged
Yet I'd not have it changed if I could;
For I know that my Saviour would change it
If to change it would be for my good.
And often God's smile lights my pathway,
And the warmth of his love fills my breast;
Then the mountains are swallowed in glory,
And the chasms are dales of sweet rest.

A Wife, Wentworth, writes:

I have received much comfort and strength from reading the column of "Answered Prayers;" it gave me new strength and courage to continue praying for my unconverted husband; and now I thank God my prayers have been answered. I wish I could encourage other troubled souls as I have been encouraged.

S. G., Forest, Ohio, writes:

I have been helped by the acknowledgments of answered prayers. Some of my petitions have been answered; some I have to believe will be, if not I know it is for the best.

A Mother, Ballstown, Ind., writes:

My son joined the army a little over three years ago; he set off for China, which grieved me sorely; I prayed earnestly to my heavenly Father to bless China with peace; this prayer God answered speedily. When the ship that carried his command reached Japan, the trouble in China was over. Then he was sent to the Philippine Islands to struggle with the insurgents there. I still continued to pray for God to spare my son and grant him a safe return; this prayer has been answered. With great joy in my heart, I testify to God's faithfulness in answering them that call upon him.

A. L., Winnipeg, Man., writes:

I desire to acknowledge the very great help I have received from the statements of those who, through the much-loved CHRISTIAN HERALD, have spoken of a prayer hearing and a prayer-answering God's faithfulness. I, too, would add my glad testimony, that in many and varied cases I have received definite fulfilment of his precious promise. In two instances this has been very marked, and I have reason again this week to praise God and give thanks for a most merciful deliverance of a dear little one from what seemed inevitable and severe suffering. "If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you."

B. M. W., Chicago, writes:

As a testimony of my gratitude to God, I pen this letter; it may help those who doubt God's power to answer prayer, and persistence, strengthen the faith of those who believe. A girl I am who prayed for an operation at a time when such a blessing seemed impossible. The fact that those persons stood ready to each other, opened a way for me, and that I am now enjoying the opportunities that seemed beyond attainment is ample evidence to me that God heard my petition.

COLLEGE PROFESSORS
Talk of Foods.

The New York papers recently contained a long account of the so-called discovery of a celebrated professor in one of the leading universities. The discovery related to a new and successful way of treating wheat and barley to prepare the starchy part by dry baking, so it would be made more digestible and nutritious. Thereupon Prof. Livingstone commenting on the discovery of the other Professor says, "A discoverer who was a business man first and a scientist afterward found that such foods could be made more digestible when cooked with dry heat instead of by boiling in water, and has already placed on the market the food which he discovered prior to Dr.——." This refers to Grape-Nuts the most scientifically made food known. Grape-Nuts can be easily digested by babies or anyone with a weak stomach and the food contains the most powerful rebuilding element known, particularly as relates to the rebuilding of the brain and nerve centres. It is a delicious food requiring no cooking but ready for instant service just as it comes from the package. A receipe book free in each package describes many delicious dishes made from Grape-Nuts.

THE LADY SERENE

By Edith Ferguson Black

CHAPTER II.—Concluded

"WHERE'S Robert?" Mrs. Briggs asked the question of her husband the next morning, as he came in from the barn, with a strange sinking at her heart. Something in the boy's face the night before had frightened her, and she had gone to call him for breakfast anxiously.

"I don't know where he is," said her husband crossly. "Anywhere but where he ought to be, I'll wager. Here, girl, can't you carry a milk pail without spilling half it holds?" He turned so savagely on his daughter Molly, that in her nervous haste she stumbled, and the whole contents of the pail poured in a white deluge on the floor.

"Hold your tongue, Silas!" said Mrs. Briggs impressively, as she shook him by the arm. "Robert has gone!"

Something in her white, set face awed him. "Gone!" he echoed.

"I went to call him and his bed had never been touched. Come and see."

He followed her silently. Pinned to the pillow they found a scrap of paper, with a few lines in pencil:

"Dear Mother: I'm going to find an education. You've always been good to me. If father had given me half a chance I'd have done my best for the farm. But it's too late now."

With a wild cry Mrs. Briggs threw her arms above her head. "He's run away! you've done it now, Silas, with your domineering ways. I hope you're satisfied! Oh, my boy, my boy!" She wrung her hands as she walked aimlessly about the room.

"Quit taking on like a fool, woman!" said her husband, sternly. "The young scamp will be back in a week, I'll warrant, and ready to eat his humble pie. He'll get a good big slice if I have the cutting of it. It's no use crying over spilt milk. There's enough of it!" he added, with grim humor.

After that Mrs. Briggs grew more than ever soured against the world and its people. She had hoped great things of the clever boy who was always first in his classes, and had often spared him to his books although it made her own work harder. And now, to have a runaway in the family! The disgrace of it seemed more than she could bear. With the unreasonableness of all narrow minds she laid the blame of this, too, on Mrs. Thurston's shoulders, and hated her with a concentration of purpose that was terrible in its force. At times, the mother in her would overpower every other consideration, and she would fret and fear for her boy. His father never mentioned his name.

The days in Hillsboro passed smoothly with little to disturb their even flow.

"I'VE BEEN WICKED," SHE SOBBED

Donald Ross was studying with an enthusiasm which made him forget his pain, and his happiness was beautiful to see.

"You are 'all things to all men,'" he told Mrs. Thurston, one morning, as she came in from the greenhouse laden with flowers for Bertha Miller's wedding, and told him of the programme she had arranged for their next musical evening. "I wish Paul could see you now."

Mrs. Thurston laughed brightly. "Oh, Donald, lad! Paul is very real to you, isn't he?"

"Yes," he answered simply. "He suits me. I suppose there is a comradeship between us,—on account of his 'thorn.' I, too, have to 'keep my body under,' you know."

"My dear, brave soldier! I am very sure that Paul himself never did it more royally than you!"

. . . . . .

Suddenly, like a thunderbolt out of a clear sky, there came the fearsome cry of Diphtheria, and, before it had time to realize its fate, Hillsboro found itself held in the grasp of an epidemic so deadly that it spared neither old or young. Mrs. Thurston and the doctor held daily consultations and telegraphed to the city for nurses, but the cases increased so rapidly the demand far exceeded the supply.

One morning she came to his office in a blue uniform. He looked at the white cross upon her arm curiously.

THE LADY SERENE

"What do you mean?" he asked abruptly.

"Only one more," she answered with a smile,

"Nonsense!" he cried, almost roughly. "Why, it would be 'pearls ——'" but the reproach in her eyes checked him.

"Are they not my friends?"

"But you do not realize the danger!"

"I am immune," she said.

* * * * * * * * * * * *

"What are you coming here for?" Mrs. Briggs lifted a gray, set face to greet her visitor. Her husband had been carried to the churchyard and in an adjoining room Molly lay moaning. "There's nothing in this house but misery and trouble. What do you want?"

Mrs. Thurston held towards her an envelope. "I bring a letter from your son."

She caught it hungrily and tore it open.

"You'll be proud of me yet, mother, but you must thank Mrs. Thurston for it. She sent me money when I was starving and she is helping me through college. Then I am coming home."

The long tension gave way and the worn out woman sobbed like a child.

Unrepulsed, Mrs. Thurston laid her hand upon her shoulder. "Now you must come and rest," she said.

* * * * * * * * * * * *

The old meeting-house was crowded as the people of Hillsboro came together again to pray. There was no singing—the choir was too full of vacant places. The minister's voice had broken as he attempted to read "Nearer, my God, to Thee" but at the first sound of the familiar words Mrs. Porter cried, "That was my Nance's hymn!" "And my John's!" "And little Ben's!" until her sobs were echoed in a storm of weeping against which the people struggled in vain.

Mrs. Thurston was sitting in one of the front pews. She rose impulsively and turned towards them. "Oh, my friends, if I could only lead you all into the Kingdom of Peace," she said. "Believe me, the Christ can give power to rise above the pain. It was no idle promise of His to give us a peace that should pass our capacity to understand. He is able to make of these very sorrows stepping stones by which we shall be lifted into a communion with himself so real that we shall prove it true that, 'Our Jesus can repay from his own fulness all he takes away.'

"You think I have had no trouble; that I do not understand. Listen.

"My husband was a king among his fellows and for five wonderful years I lived in a dream, and then, one day, they brought him home to me—murdered! and then—my baby was born.

"He was beautiful as a picture, but—but—he was always my baby, although he lived to be twenty-one. I took him to all the specialists. A case of arrested development they called it, but there was nothing to be done. My only comfort was that his father did not know!

"You thought I held aloof. Ah, forgive me. I was a proud woman. Can you fancy what it was to watch your children and contrast them with—my son! And then—God came."

Suddenly there was a movement among the hushed audience, and a tall, haggard woman came up the aisle and threw herself at Mrs. Thurston's feet.

"I've been a wicked sinner," she sobbed. "I've envied and hated you until I would have killed you if I could, and now—God has punished me."

Mrs. Thurston knelt down and put her arms about her. "Let us pray," she said.

Soothed and comforted the people listened, as this tried soul lifted them up to the heart of God.

"And now may the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, make you perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is well pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ our Lord."

Lady Serene had pronounced her benediction.

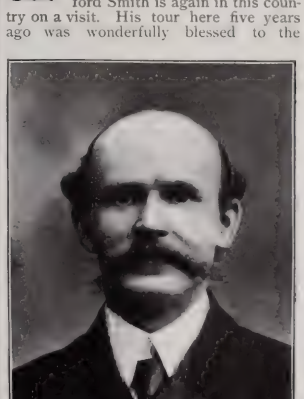
A Pastor's Helper

Rev. H. Stafford Smith, the English Evangelist, now Visiting the United States

THERE are Christian people in many of our cities who will be glad to hear that Rev. H. Stafford Smith is again in this country on a visit. His tour here five years ago was wonderfully blessed to the churches with whom he labored. There are some now in active Christian work in many cities that he visited then who have reason to bless the Providence that brought him to our shores. Some there were who had sat under the Gospel ministry for years, who were brought to instant decision under Mr. Smith's preaching and singing. Many young people, too, were led to give up the habit of procrastination, which in these days besets so many, and to consecrate their lives to Christ. His children's services, lasting usually about an hour, are a delightful experience. He takes a Bible incident, telling it in modern phrases and with modern coloring, and shows how its teaching applies to present day life. The charm of the story and of incidents relating to it wins the children's attention at the start and keeps it to the close, when, with a few vivid touches, they are led to see how their own lives may be made Christian, noble and beautiful.



REV. H. STAFFORD SMITH

In the general meetings, Mr. Smith adapts himself to the character of the preaching that has already been common in the church, trying to gather its characteristic lessons to a focus and bring them to bear personally on his hearers. In this way he avails himself of the preparation of the heart which has been formerly applied; and when he leaves, the pastor resumes his work in an uninterrupted continuity. It is the old truth with a different presentation which strikes the hearer as novel and forceful. Mr. Smith has had a long and successful experience with English audiences, among both mechanics and agricultural populations, and is noted for reaching the hearts of communities which have remained stolid under ordinary preaching.

Any pastor or church desiring to take advantage of Mr. Smith's visit may address him at this office, Bible House, New York, and we will forward the letter to him at the town he happens to have reached on his tour.

A Composite Poem

THE "Family Art Gallery," we think that it is very neat.
The pictures are all beautiful.
Some are so merry and so sweet.
Some teach a lesson dutiful.

And some are grand and some are strong
"Lost in the Storm" is both, we ween.
Full lovely is the "Even Song,"
And all are fine as can be seen.

One dollar and-a-half for these Alone would be a trifling price,
To give them with the paper free
For that small sum is very nice.

MARRIAGE AND CAREER

Is a man or woman justified, for the sake of achieving what the world calls "A Successful Career," in renouncing marriage, and avoiding the cares and responsibilities, as well as the joys and dignities of home life?

Married Life the True Life

To my mind no one is justified in renouncing married life. Why? Because married life is a complete life. One may have a successful career in business, or even in religion, as did Paul, sucessful, yet incomplete, because he never obeyed the first command God gave to man (Gen. 1 : 28). What is a complete successful life? A life that has hearkened to the voice of God in childhood, been obedient unto his moral laws, matured into manhood or womanhood, pure and virtuous; then, by the counsel of God, selected a partner for life, one who was spiritually right with God; then lived together, both loyal to their vows, and like Hannah, the mother of Samuel, consecrated their unborn children to God; then reared them in the fear and admonition of the Lord, and by his help, raised them into a pure man or womanhood. This is a true, successful life, full of cares and responsibilities as well as joys and dignities, which no one is justified in renouncing. C. L. SCHMIDT.
Philadelphia.

Celibacy not a Danger

In regard to either sex, I would say: Pull in the single harness, when the double harness would interfere with achieving a religiously successful career. Do not think that, by so doing, marriage will become so infrequent that our country will be depopulated. Is Cupid dead? Did you ever hear of his funeral? I never did. In fact, the last picture I ever saw of him he wore glasses. Having recovered from his blindness, it is probable he will shoot more than ever and more accurately too.
Brewster, N. Y. LEON LEWIS HADDEN.

Man Free to Follow His Career

I do not think the Scriptures authorize any person to assume this obligation. Who among God's saints have married simply from a sense of duty to him? God has implanted in us attributes which seek enjoyment in different lines. The person who marries is simply following and obeying a propensity, and deserves no credit. On the other hand, the person who foregoes for the sake of greater success, should not be blamed. Love should always be the motive, and the renouncing of marriage would signify an absence or deficiency of love, which would result in unhappiness in the marriage state. Any person, who for the sake of greater worldly success, can surrender love, is at liberty to do so.
Webster City, Ia. ULYSSES G. WILLIS.

Marriage, a Universal Duty

No. Every young man or woman who is fit morally and physically should desire marriage and a home. No pursuing of a career will justify any one in shirking his duty toward those who come after him. They should stand before his own personal need. And why need marriage and the duties of home life lessen one's ambition? I can see no reason why one may not achieve a successful career and at the same time perform his (or her) duties toward mankind. C. PUTNAM.
Brooks Station, Mass.

A Bachelor Maid's Reply

There are many reasons why the modern young woman, college-bred or otherwise, does not marry. She is quite able to support herself, and her social position is secure, even though she earn her own living. The one reason she sees for giving up her independence is love, and possibly it takes more of a man to inspire love in her independent heart than it did in the heart of her mother or grandmother. Her head must first be convinced that the man who is seeking her favor is clean morally, reasonably strong mentally, at least as well educated as she is, in good physical health, and with the well-balanced disposition that education and right living alone can give. If our modern woman be a Christian, she hopes to find a well-developed spiritual nature, or at least a sincere respect for her own religious convictions. Then, too, she has probably earned her own money and spent it as she pleased, and the knowledge that many women must needs go to their husbands whenever a new hat is desired, or baby needs new shoes, is not encouraging. With her whole intense woman's nature, she longs for the shelter of a strong man's love, for a home, for baby arms about her neck, for the soft pressure of a baby face against her own, for the music of baby voices about her hearthstone; but she is inclined to be particular as to whom she will select to be the father of her babies, for she looks forward to the time when these babies shall be men and women, and she knows full well the effect of heredity as well as of environment, upon the human species. All the allurements of love, of home, of prattling children, sink into insignificance beside the fear that some taint of vice, disease, or of crime, might attach to these little lives brought into the world through her instrumentality, and she hesitates.

But there is another side. Our modern young woman meets a man in whom she finds no fatal flaw. Their tastes are congenial, ambitions similar, mentally they seem just fitted for each other; but her heart refuses to follow the conclusions of her mind. Is she then justified in giving her hand without her heart, to a man who gives her both? Is she doing the fair thing by him, even though she be a faultless housekeeper, an economical manager, a devoted wife and mother, in giving him a loveless home?

I believe that few modern young women give up marriage for a career. But thousands upon thousands choose a career of their own, however humble, to marriage with a man they do not love, or whom, loving, they cannot fully trust or respect. The brightest, most successful professional women I have ever known did not hesitate to give up their careers for love, when their well-trained heads told them their hearts had selected wisely.
A BACHELOR MAID.
New York City.

The Inherent Desire for Companionship

In no case would a man or woman be so justified. God has placed in the human heart that inherent desire for the companionship of the opposite sex, which no man can eradicate; and, in almost all cases where marriage is shunned, it can be traced to one of two causes. First, for the purpose of gaining more wealth in a shorter time (which might be termed a "successful career" in these days), and second, for the purpose of avoiding the cares and responsibilities of home-making and bringing up a family.
Leonta, N. Y. PARKER KNAPP.

It is not Good to be Alone

The world's idea of a successful career is the attainment of wealth, or fame, or power; and for such success it might be said, almost without exception, that no man or woman is justified in renouncing marriage and family responsibilities. If we set before us the highest goal of success—the devoting of our powers to the spiritual betterment of our fellowmen—there are some few cases in which family responsibilities might be renounced. The case of the Apostle Paul shows that there may be such exceptional cases. But we ought to have a very clear call to such a course of life before accepting it. Here is where the trouble comes in. A person may be impelled either by enthusiasm or misanthropy, to launch on such a career, who has really no marked qualification for it. For the great bulk of mankind, the safe and simple rule holds that "it is not good for man to be alone." And the family relationships involved in the observance of this rule provide opportunities of the highest real success on a moral plane, and under sacrifices the most sacred in human life. In this age of enthusiasm and quasi-enthusiasm, it is a wholesome thing to fall back on the simplicities of duty and opportunity. JOSEPH HAMILTON.
Mimico, Can.

Marriage an Incentive to Success

Marriage is the natural state planned by an all-wise Creator, in which, as a rule, both man and woman may reach the highest possible state of development—a development where the powers of mind, heart and soul are well-balanced, and which results in a beautifully rounded, symmetrical character. Naturally, the human heart yearns for this sacred love and companionship, and the man or woman who deliberately shuts such joys and responsibilities out of his life, with no higher motive than that he may gain wealth or fame, chooses a sordid, narrow, selfish existence, and misses the highest, sweetest and noblest in life. A well-chosen life partner, instead of being a drawback, proves an inspiration and an incentive to reach the highest attainments of which one is capable.
McMinnville, Tenn. KATHERINE RUSSELL.

The "Bachelor Woman" Justified

I have always believed that every able-bodied man who has sufficient brains to make a comfortable living, and who is capable of love, should take care of some good woman. A wise marriage would tend to help rather

o Home nor Country Without Marriage

In a certain very beautiful part of the earth, here the brooks from Lebanon flow silently, ere are many monuments of ruin. On them is engraved: "Born—Died." The only ing commendable is born. This is because e once prosperous people did not obey od. They achieved successful career in assive ruins. There is another section from hich came Ruth, David, Jesus, Paul. Paul eceived a wireless message from heaven cts 26: 18), preached it at Berea, and from thence it emigrated to the land of Luther, Knox, and Wesley, thence to America. If we should renounce marriage, forgetting a "help meet," our land, too, would soon be only a graveyard of fine monuments. In one-third of a century weeds and frost would overthrow this kind of successful career. There can be neither home nor country without a mother, the "crown upon the head" of her husband. There are no grand ruins the result of this marriage.

JACOB FLOMERFELT.

Gladstone, N. J.

Celibacy, a Serious Mistake

I think not; if the achieving of what the world calls "a successful career," is the only reason. Those who forego the joys of married life for some good and noble purpose, that they may be more useful in the world and have more time to devote to lifting up their fellow-beings, to science, or to the great and important affairs of life—makes a great sacrifice. They deny themselves for the good of others. Of course a person, I suppose, has the right to marry or not to marry. It is a matter for each to decide for themselves honestly and conscientiously. But one who foregoes the joys—or refuses to assume the cares and responsibilities of married life for the sake of fame, fortune, or what the world calls a successful career, makes a serious mistake, as he shall find later in life.

eader, St. Paul, Minn. What organized steps are being taken to prevent Senator-elect Smoot from taking his seat?

Formal protests have been sent to the enate Elections Committee from representa- ve residents of Utah, alleging that Smoot is tually a polygamist. This charge, if sus- ined, may of itself be sufficient to bar him t. The Interdenominational Council of omen have also lodged a protest, asserting at Smoot is a member of a secret oathbound rganization; that he is a member of the Mor- on Council, and sworn to obey the com- ands of the Mormon Church. Other organi- tions are about to take similar action.

, Lynn, Mass. 1. What is the duty of an em- ployee entrusted with responsibility by his principals as office manager, in a case where, through negligence or otherwise, one under him causes loss of money? 2. Is he justified in keeping silent if such loss may not be recover- able? 3. What should be the duty as one next to the office manager, who knows the circum- stances?

1. He should inform the principals, and if he loss was the result of carelessness on his rt, he should do everything in his power to ake it good. 2. No; if he be a faithful ser- ant he will not keep the matter hidden. 3. e occupies a delicate position. Probably e best thing he could do is to communicate s knowledge of events to the manager. It the manager's duty, not the subordinate's, inform the principals; but if the manager stinctly ordered him to keep it hidden, he ould be justified in laying the matter before e principals, although it might cost him his osition.

It is the kernel of the nuts of a species of alm which grows in Peru and other parts of outh America. They are called, com- ercially, "corrozzo nuts." The ripe kernel white and hard. It is used extensively by utton-makers and for umbrella-handles and mall trinkets.

H., Oakwood, O. What is the meaning of "humble yourself in the sight of God," or "except ye become as humble as a little child, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven?"

Human pride and arrogance should have o place in our hearts and thoughts, when we neel before the throne of God. We are all hildren of the Divine Father, weak and elpless in his hands and wholly dependent pon his goodness. We should come, there- fore, in the spirit of children, meek and simple and obedient, and laying aside all vanity and self-sufficiency.

H. H. McP., Brandon Hills, Can. I notice that the Finland Famine Fund is nearly all made up of small amounts. Were are our rich, or do they contribute direct, or through other channels, or do they turn a deaf ear to such calls, and have their whole soul wrapped up in their wealth?

We have no means of knowing how the wealthy class contribute in such matters. They may do otherwise, as you suggest. We are glad, however, to know that so many in moderate circumstances, and even poor, are not forgetful of the call of suffering humanity, and make willing sacrifice for Christ's sake.

C. R. G., Harrisburg, O. Is it right for a local preacher and a Sunday School superintendent (a stone mason by trade), to lay the founda tion of a building which he knows will be a saloon?

It is difficult to understand how any one could ask the Divine blessing on a building intended for a business which brings ruin to body and soul.

Mrs. De Bord, of Sharpsdale, Colo., writes, that on account of drought, there is great suffering among the homesteaders in that section. Many have spent everything, and are without food and clothing and have no seed for planting. None are actually starving, but the outlook is ominous. They are honest and industrious and deserve help.

Mrs. Bessie M., Stafford, Va., writes:

In reading an article in your editorial forum, headed "Idols from America," I am prompted to suggest that some of the American Christians gather around that poor Korean heathen, who is seeking for gods to worship, and point out to him the God which all can worship without cost and with eternal profit, and send him back to his countrymen a convert to the only true and living God.

Rev. C. H. Trowbridge, Easton, Pa. In your Feb. 25 MAIL BAG, in answer to the question, "When, where, and by whom was the first Sunday School organized?" you say, "It is generally conceded that the first Sunday School was organized by Robert Raikes, a printer, in Gloucester, England, in 1784." Permit me to say that your Lutheran readers will differ with you as to this statement. Under the head "Sunday Schools," in the Lutheran Cyclopedia (Chas. Scribner's Sons, 1899), it is asserted that "the Sunday School may be said to have originated in the Bible school of the ancient synagogue. The two essential characteristics of the modern Sunday School are the interlocutory method of instruction, and the system of division into groups or classes. In the synagogue school the method was catechetical. To trace the history of catechetical instruction is to connect this early Sabbath School with the 'Ragged Sunday School' which A. H. Francke opened in 1695, in Halle, nearly a hundred years before Robert Raikes began his famous work, with his paid teachers, in England. I call attention to this historic fact, not from any desire to start a controversy, but simply to supply information.

MISSIONS IN AFRICA*

The Pioneer Missionaries who Gave their Lives to the Evangelization of the Dark Continent

WIDE is the field chosen for consideration on Missionary day. No one can even guess at the population of Africa, which is roughly estimated at two hundred millions, with any degree of assurance. The variety of races, too, in the Dark Continent, renders missionary effort varied to an uncommon degree. There is no connection between the Mohammedan population of the North with the Kaffirs and Zulus of the Southeast, the Hottentots of the South, the savages of the West, and the wild tribes of the interior. Every mission was compelled to work independently, and had not even the advantage of a common language to aid in the work in different regions. With all the discouragements, however, from the nature of the inhabitants, the climate, and not least the rapacity of European governments, which have exasperated the people against white men, by seizing the most fertile lands and parcelling them among themselves, the triumphs of the Gospel in that country have been marvelous.

Less than a hundred years ago, the only regions touched by the missionary were those constituting a thin belt around the coasts of the Continent and in that belt there were many and extensive breaks. In 1818 Robert Moffatt began his pioneer work in the South, extending the operations begun by Dr. Van Der Kemp. David Livingstone took up the work, extending it northward into the interior, and adding vast regions, previously unknown, to the map. It was not until 1840 that Livingstone left his native land for Africa, so that our knowledge of that vast region which he was the first to explore, is only half a century old. His first journey of exploration was begun in 1849. Shortly after his return in the following year he began that arduous journey across Africa, which occupied four years of his life. Three years after his return, spent in trying to arouse the interest of the civilized world in the great work of evangelizing the tribes he had visited on his march, he set out on his next great journey of exploration on the Zambesi, during which he discovered the great lakes Nyassa and Shirwa. His last journey was begun in 1865. During that journey he discovered Lake Tanganyka. Worn by privation, hardship and toil, Stanley found him at Ujiji in 1871, a broken, prematurely aged man, who for six years had not looked on a white face. Yet he was still full of ardor in his work and stubbornly refused to return with Stanley. He had given his life to Africa, and his journals sent home after his death, two years later, show that his devotion ended only with his life. To his pioneer labors the missionary societies have been indebted for all that they have been enabled to do in the interior of the continent during the past quarter of a century.

Melville B. Cox was another one of the many martyrs who have given their lives to the evangelization of Africa. Though his period of labor was only five months, he laid during that time the lines of foundation on which Methodist missions in the Dark Continent have been conducted since his time. His sphere was in Liberia, where he landed in 1833. He was only entering upon the great work he had sketched out, when he was seized with fever and died. He was a native of Hallowell, Me., born there in 1799.

Alexander M. Mackay, the hero of Uganda, was sent out by the Church Missionary Society in 1876. At that time nothing was known of the region save the reports that Stanley had given and the facts recorded in Livingstone's journal. Never did man set to work with more energy and vigor. To him belongs the credit of first proposing and advocating the plan which alone has in it the hope of thorough evangelization of those deadly regions. He urged the erection of a college in some healthy location, in which American and European missionaries could train natives, who were inured to the climate, to go forth and preach to their countrymen. If his plan had only been adopted more extensively, how many precious lives might have been saved and how much more good might have been done! His work lasted fourteen years, and was one of strenuous labor, sorrow and disappointment. In 1890, the crown of martyrdom was set on his brows, and he went to his reward. If he can now know what a glorious harvest of souls has been reaped in the region to which he gave his life, he like the Master, whom he served so faithfully, sees of the travail of his soul and is satisfied.

Adolphus C. Good was an American pioneer for the Presbyterian Church. He gave twelve years to earnest work, and then he, too, fell a victim to the fever. Volumes would be needed to give but the slightest sketch of the labors of the devoted men like Hannington, Bishop Taylor, Dr. Stewart and others, whose lives have been consecrated to this arduous work.

A Young African Convert

IN a letter by the Rev. R. Wodehouse, Missionary, Umtali, Rhodesia, South Africa, the writer says:

"A dear lad, only sixteen years old, was converted in our native church, and came forward as a seeker, to an old rude penitent form made out of packing cases. It is wonderful how he has grown in six months. I am giving him an opportunity at the meetings to exercise his powers. He exhorts with power, prays in the Spirit, and sings like an angel. He has chosen the ministry, he says, as his life work, and we are bending every energy in that direction. Mrs. Carson is giving him an hour daily. He knows his multiplication tables, writes a fair hand, reads fluently and drinks in the expositions of the Word with eagerness. He has a gift for poetry, and may be useful in time in preparing a hymn book."

"WILLIE," THE AFRICAN CONVERT

Henry Drummond's Conversion

THE Rev. E. Payson Hammond, A. M., widely recognized as "The Prince of Preachers for Children," closed a series of evangelistic meetings February 25, in Wilkinsborough, Pa.; 350 at least are reported to have confessed Christ. Mr. Hammond is now working with Rev. Dr. Reed in the Washington Square Methodist Episcopal Church in New York City. The following reminiscence of the distinguished evangelist is both opportune and interesting:

When in Scotland, I became acquainted with Mr. Peter Drummond. It was in the year 1859 that he invited me to his home in Stirling. Soon after my arrival I found the children from all around the neighborhood tramping through the deep snow, pressing their way to his large parlors. It was quite a surprise party to me, but Mr. Drummond had been in some meetings of mine in other places, and knew how the children loved them. So he sent all through the town, and got as many as he could to meet me, and I am sure that he and his good wife had been much in prayer that God's blessing might be upon the gathering. At that time few people in Scotland thought of singing American hymns; but I had some with me and I asked the children to join in the singing of them. I told them of the great love of Jesus in giving himself to die for them and explained how it was that, because of his sufferings on the cross in our place, God could now forgive all their sins, give them new hearts, and make them happy here and hereafter.

I noticed in front of me a little boy, with curly, golden hair, who seemed much interested in all that I said. At the close of the meeting, he and others remained that we might talk and pray with each one. He put his little hand in mine and said, "I want to be a Christian and love Jesus."

I told him again what Jesus had done for him, and asked, "How can you help loving him, when he has suffered so much for you, that you might be happy in heaven, and wear a crown of joy?"

He answered, "I must love him, and I will give myself to him."

We knelt, and he took this prayer from my lips, "Dear Jesus, thou hast loved me and died for me, that I might have my sins forgiven; and now, as well as I can, I am going to give myself to thee, and will never be ashamed of thee who hast done so much for me."

I believe it was there, in his uncle's house, that this little boy, afterward Professor Henry Drummond, accepted Christ as his Saviour, and from that hour began to live a new, happy, Christian life.

OUR SUNDAY HOUR WITH THE LITTLE FOLKS

What scene in the Old Testament does this picture illustrate? Write "Competition 29" plainly across the top of a postal card or sheet of paper; write next your name, age or address; then, in not over thirty words, a description of the picture. First, read the rules carefully

CHILDREN, dear, for sake of variety, and because of requests from some little friends, we give this week a Bible Picture, such as you ad in the first competitions, instead of icture Puzzles. We hope you will have pleasant "Sunday Hour" finding out hat it is, and writing, in not less than irty words, what you know about it. nd we trust that you will not think only the winning of a prize by doing this, but at you will find the task a pleasure in it- lf; otherwise, we would rather you would not undertake it. In regard to one of our first prize-winners announced this week, it may be said that she has sent in answers regularly to many competitions: other answers were better, and so, we could not award her even a consolation prize. Her persistent and patient endeavor impressed the judges, who have been watching her work. It has improved from week to week, and her paper on which award was made is of such exceptional excellence, that it surpassed our own expectations, and the watch—the first prize—is rightfully awarded her.

Competition 30

Curious Questions

1. A noted prophet set an example that public men of the present day usually try to avoid following. Name the prophet and the example?
2. Who was the first negro convert to Christianity?
3. What is the first record of a home being mortgaged?
4. Name the agricultural implements mentioned in the Bible?

Write "Competition 30" plainly across the top of your postal card or sheet of paper; next, your name, age, and address. Answer as many of the questions as you can, writing in each case the number of the question (not the question itself) before its answer. Answers to all four questions must not exceed fifty words in the aggregate. Read the following rules.

RULES AND PRIZES

Contests are not open to competitors over fourteen years of age. Only one weekly competition is open to any one person. If you answer both Competition 29 and 30 you forfeit your chances therefor. Do not send two solutions. There is no objection to asking the help of others, but each competitor must send in the answers in his or her own handwriting. Should you use paper instead of a postal card, be sure to write on the envelope in which you enclose your answer "Competition 29" or "Competition 30," as the case may be. Do not write on both sides of a sheet of paper.

All answers must be mailed not later than March 25, 1903. Address, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Little Folks' Department, Bible House, New York.

Prizes—For the best answer to Competition 29, a handsome silver watch, lady's or gentleman's. For the best answer to Competition 30, a handsome silver watch, lady's or gentleman's. For the next best answer from each State, territory and Canadian province sending meritorious responses to competitions, a beautiful book as consolation prize.

"To save time is to lengthen life." Do you value life? Then use SAPOLIO

QUAINT PSALMS for QUEER FOLK

By Rev. C. H. Yatman

PSALM LXXXIX
Covenant Psalm

1. I will sing of the mercies of the Lord for ever: with my mouth will I make known thy faithfulness to all generations.

"I WILL SING OF THY MERCIES"

2. For I have said, Mercy shall be built up for ever: thy faithfulness shalt thou establish in the very heavens.

3. I have made a covenant with my chosen, I have sworn unto David my servant.

4. Thy seed will I establish for ever, and build up thy throne to all generations.

. . . .

"A covenant keeping God"—the very name is a bulwark to saints. A covenant keeping people would result from the applied truth of Psalm 89. Isaiah 55:3 is a prophet's story of God's faithfulness. This is the Psalmist's way of telling the same truth. Faithfulness can only come by faith-full-ness. "He is faithful that hath promised." So let us be.

PSALM XC
Funeral Psalm

1. Lord, thou hast been our dwelling-place in all generations.

A WATCH IN THE NIGHT"

2. Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting, thou art God.

3. Thou turnest man to destruction; and sayest, Return, ye children of men.

4. For a thousand years in thy sight are but as yesterday when it is past, and as a watch in the night.

. . . .

God would let no human hands bury the man who wrote this, He buried him. The only headstone to mark his grave is this. It fits the great Hebrew lawgiver. It is the Pentateuch epitomized. It is the old wine of experience, and could only come from one whose life was amidst battle and storm and bondage. No wonder he appears in the transfiguration, and is the centre of "The Faith Chapter"—Hebrews 11. This Psalm and I. Corinthians 15 robs death of sting, and gives the grave no victory.

PSALM XCI Safety Psalm

1. He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty.

"FROM THE SNARE OF THE FOWLER

2. I will say of the Lord, He is my refuge and my fortress: my God; in him will I trust.

3. Surely he shall deliver thee from the snare of the fowler, and from the noisome pestilence.

4. He shall cover thee with his feathers, and under his wings shalt thou trust: his truth shall be thy shield and buckler.

. . . .

For tempted, tried and sore perplexed people, there is no Psalm like the ninety-first. In poetry or prose, sung in the major or minor key, it alike is big and beautiful. Its sixteen verses are all diamonds. Its song is of safety, and its safety is salvation. Not only God, but his angels, are here to guard and guide the good.

PSALM XCII
The Righteous Man's Psalm

12. The righteous shall flourish like the palm tree: he shall grow like a cedar in Lebanon.

"LIKE A CEDAR IN LEBANON"

13. Those that be planted in the house of the Lord shall flourish in the courts of our God.

14. They shall still bring forth fruit in old age; they shall be fat and flourishing.

. . . .

It is only a righteous man that can really put soul in song or Psalm. Sin is discord. Then, too, the righteous flourish—like palm and cedar. What a difference there is between the righteous and wicked. It is giant oak against thistle and briar. It is fatness and fruit against failure and fire.

How to Paint a House Cheap

And Have it Guaranteed to Look Better, Wear Longer and Cost Less Than the Best White Lead Paints.

Never Fades, Cracks, Chalks, Peels or Blisters and is Not Affected by Gases. Fifty Sample Colors and Illustrated Booklet Prepaid to Any Address Absolutely Free.

The cost of painting the house and barn, outbuildings and fences is a heavy burden. Cheap paints soon fade, peel or scrape off and white lead and oil costs so much and has to be replaced so often that it is a constant expense to keep the bright, clean appearance so desirable in the cozy cottage home or the elegant mansion. The following are a few of the large users of Carrara Paint:

Pennsylvania R. R. Co.; Pullman Palace Car Co.; Chicago Telephone Co.; Central Union Telephone Co.; Field Museum, Chicago; Kenwood Club, Chicago; Cincinnati Southern; C. & E. I. R. R. Co.; Denver & Rio Grande R. R.; Wellington Hotel, Chicago.

Carrara is used because it lasts longer, never fades, never cracks, never blisters, never peels, covers more surface than the highest priced paints and costs less than the cheap mixed paints that injure instead of protect. There is but one Carrara. It is made by the Carrara Paint Agency, General Offices, 785 Carrara Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio, and anyone having a house to paint should send for 50 free sample colors and our handsome booklet, showing many buildings reproduced in all the colors just as they are painted from this great paint that has stood the most rigid tests for 25 years and, bear in mind, that it is the only paint ever manufactured that is backed by a positive guarantee in every case. Distributing depots in all principal cities. Write to-day and save half your paint bills in the future.

100 Persons Relieved EVERY DAY OF RHEUMATISM

by Magic Foot Drafts. Sent on Approval Anywhere in America. TRY THEM FREE.

They Will Relieve You

If you read this, you will probably send for a pair of drafts and get rid of your rheumatism. A great many persons try Magic Foot Drafts every month—at our expense. Thousands are made well—and pay. Some are not, but have found out without expense that they have something else besides rheumatism. We have thousands of letters on file from Judges, Lawyers, Ministers, Officials of the government, and business men saying that Magic Foot Drafts relieved them—many after everything else had failed. All these are open to the public, with a standing offer of $5,000.00 reward to anyone who finds that they are not all given in good faith and without any consideration whatsoever, excepting the good the Drafts had done.

Magic Foot Drafts open the pores of the feet, the largest in the body, and by means of the intricate, capillary development of the blood vessels here draw out and neutralize by alkaline reaction the acid poison accumulations in the blood, reaching and permanently relieving rheumatism in every part of the body. Our free booklet will convince you that Magic Foot Drafts, which at first glance may seem unreasonable, are really the most logical treatment ever discovered for rheumatism. We want to send you a pair on approval without a cent in advance.

If you are satisfied with the benefit received, send us One Dollar. If not, keep your money. Write the Magic Foot Draft Co., R. A. 18 Oliver Bldg., Jackson, Mich., to-day.

WAS REFUSED LIFE INSURANCE

Rejected on Account of "Coffee Heart."

Life insurance companies have fully established the fact that the use of coffee causes an organic derangement of the heart, shortening the long beat and imperiling life. For this reason habitual coffee drinkers are refused life insurance in many cases. A well known merchant of White's Creek, Tenn., proprietor of a large store there, says:—"Three years ago I was examined for life insurance and to my surprise was rejected because my heart action was at times out of place 15 beats in 60.

"I consulted several good doctors and was invariably asked by them 'Do you drink ardent spirits? use tobacco? or drink coffee?' To the first I answered 'Very little,' to the second 'No,' to the last 'Yes,' and they would all say, 'Quit coffee.'

"I determined to do this. I had read about Postum Cereal Coffee and bought and used it and I liked it as well as the best of real coffee find as a result of its use in place of coffee I and myself without a skip in my heart action and I can get insurance on my life cheaper by 25 per cent (notwithstanding the advance in ages), than I could when I first commenced using Postum." Name furnished by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Paul's Life and Teaching

Dependent in all Things on God's Guidance

By Mrs. M. Baxter

THERE are several biographies given at some length in the Old Testament—those of Abraham, Joseph, Moses, Joshua, Elijah, etc. In the New Testament, next to our Lord's own life, no individual man stands out so prominently as Paul, "the apostle of the Gentiles." It was to him that God's thought, hidden from ages and generations, was revealed; and he became the chief organizer of the Gentile Church, which is, in fact, one with "the churches which were in Judea," and whose joint existence is owing to the death and resurrection of the Lord Jesus.

This man, with his chosen companion Silas, began a mission at Philippi, where the prayers of a company of women had been heard of God, and he had not permitted the continuance of Paul's ministry among the Jewish colonists in Asia Minor, because he needed him to commence a purely Gentile Church—the first on the continent of Europe. God has a plan for each of our lives. If we are pliable, and yield up our will at all points to him, he leads us in the way of the plan which he has foreseen; when we find one obstacle after another in the way of plans which we may have formed, however good they may seem to be, it is the moment for us to consider, and to inquire of the Lord, whether we are mistaken, and whether the plan we have is really that which is in his mind. Paul was fully loyal to his God in this matter; he would not go forward until he knew the mind of God. God can bless and greatly use such an instrument. We read how, as soon as the devil's stronghold in the poor possessed girl was attacked, he stirred up persecution, and the two missionaries were thrown into prison. But the Word of God which had been sown in Philippi, grew, and brought forth fruit, as we see from the Epistle to the Philippians, in which Paul tells out so fully his personal experience, and what the high calling which he taught, was in his own life (Phil. 3: 1-16).

We see also how fully Paul lived out all he taught. He did not call upon his children in the Lord to tread a path which he himself was not treading; they saw in him that Christianity is not a doctrine, but a life; not an opinion, but a power. Wherever Paul was, men felt his presence, or rather the presence of God indwelling him. He entered the prayer-meeting of women by the riverside; and the Spirit of God which was in him entered into the heart of Lydia. He entered into Lydia's house; the whole house was changed, and became disciples of the Lord. He was thrown into the prison, and the very prison and its jailer became changed, and all the jailer's household believed, and were baptized. In the epistle to the Philippians, where we read of Paul a prisoner in Rome, the presence of this man and his bonds were known in all the Prætorium. The apostle says, "My bonds became manifest in Christ throughout the whole Prætorium guard, and to all the rest" (Phil. 1: 13, R. V.). All around him became changed; but once changed himself, no circumstance could change him back to what he had been.

"My bonds became manifest in Christ." What an expression! How full of meaning! Christ was made manifest in the way in which his character shone out through Paul in his imprisonment. There was in him no self-pity, no desire to excite sympathy for his hard lot. There was no regret that he was no longer free to travel about and preach the Gospel. He accepted from the hand of God his new vocation to preach by his life as a prisoner, and because it pleased God, the sunlight of God was on the countenance, and shining in the spirit of his servant; and men marveled; for they had never seen the like before. His Epistle to the Philippians is not the letter of an oppressed or wounded spirit. He praises God even for what might seem a hindrance to the Gospel; his faith triumphed over circumstances, and with the vigor of one who is strong in faith, he gives glory to God when others would have complained. This is "newness of life," "the power of an endless life." This strikes men; they cannot get over it; they persecute such witnesses for God, they may kill them, but they cannot forget what they have seen in them.

IF YOU COULD MAKE $5,000

BY PAYING $6. A MONTH

—$510. IN ALL—WOULD YOU DO IT?

WE put the above startling headline at the top of our advertisement for two purposes—one, to induce every reader of The Christian Herald to at least read the advertisement through. Second, in the hope that at least half of them will let us tell our story and endeavor to prove that we have an investment in New York real estate which in 10 years will return to you several thousand dollars, perhaps as much as $5,000 for each $500 invested—and this $500 can be paid at the rate of $6 per month. We know we have one of the greatest propositions in real estate every offered in the history of cities, and our difficulty is not to convince you, but to get the chance of presenting the facts to you.

$500 invested for a child may put him through college; $500 invested for a young married couple will go far toward making them independent in their old years; $500 invested by a young man or a young woman will, in our opinion, pay them better than any life insurance they can possibly take out, and this $500 can be invested at $6 a month.

4,000 Investors Bought $3,461,000 Worth of our New York Lots During the Past Year

Nearly three and a half million dollars!—that's the forceful story of our real estate sales during the year just ended. We ask you to dwell on these figures long enough to realize—to understand what they really mean. These three and a half million dollars actually represent the confidence which the thousands who have invested in our New York City lots have in us. You, perhaps, have not yet invested—not even investigated our wonderful proposition:—

"$10 Secures a $510 Lot in Greater New York"

COPYRIGHT, 1901, UNDERHILL

Within 35 Minutes of These Skyscrapers—by Trolley, 5c.

This is a high-class and strictly honest proposition, or you may be sure The Christian Herald would not permit our announcement to appear. Nor would we have the privilege of referring to twenty odd National Banks, the Commercial Agencies, and over 30,000 customers all over the United States.

Doesn't it seem fair to presume that the same reasons which convinced so many thousands of practical thinking men and women everywhere of the undoubted value of our proposition, would convince YOU? Isn't it worth the time at least to send us your name to-day—and learn how you may make thousands by paying $10 down and $6 a month until your payments amount to $510—and in the meantime own the safest form of investment in the world.

This may sound extravagant—yet every statement we make is based upon a fact. It is in evidence—it can be verified—it can be SEEN. Naturally we will be accused of being biased in our opinions—of painting New York's future in too rosy colors—but listen!

HERE'S THE OPINION AND ADVICE

OF ONE OF THE

World's Greatest Investors and Financiers, RUSSELL SAGE

(From the New York World of September 28th, 1902.)

"I do not think the future of New York can be depicted in terms any too glowing. The most fanciful writers cannot exaggerate the greatness of its future.

"A man who buys real estate in any of the five boroughs—of course exercising average good judgment—has a fortune before him. Brooklyn is growing at the rate of 75,000 people a year."

"Young man, buy real estate in the outlying boroughs, and then work hard at your usual avocation. Your real estate purchases will make your old age comfortable." RUSSELL SAGE.

Our property is located in Brooklyn—it is therefore a very significant fact when Mr. Sage says "BROOKLYN IS GROWING AT THE RATE OF 75,000 PEOPLE A YEAR." Think of it! That means THREE-FOURTHS of all of New York's enormous yearly increase of population.

FREE TRIP TO NEW YORK

As a guarantee of good faith, we agree with all persons living East of Chicago to pay you in cash the cost of your railroad fare to New York and return, if you visit our property and find one word of this advertisement a misrepresentation; or in case you buy, we will credit cost of the fare on your purchase; to those living farther away we will pay a proportion equal to round-trip Chicago ticket—$36.

If you should die at any time before payments have been completed, we will give to your heirs a deed of the lot without further cost. If you should lose employment or be sick, you will not forfeit the land. You have absolutely nothing to lose by writing at once for full particulars, or better still—mail us $10, the first payment on a lot, with the distinct understanding that we must return it to you if we have misrepresented our proposition in the slightest particular. Write under all circumstances. You would not be fair to yourself if you failed to look into this matter. Fill out the coupon and mail it to us to-day. That costs two cents and a minute's time. Isn't it worth while?

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AN ILLUSTRATED FAMILY MAGAZINE

The "White Button Brigade"

AND ITS GOSPEL WORK AMONG THE RAILROAD MEN OF THE WEST

ONE among the important departments in the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is that of work among the railroad employees. Temperance reform in the railroad business is coming to the front. Law is power when enforced, and rules against railroad employees visiting saloons are being enforced with the best results to all concerned. If there is one place above another where clear brains and steady nerves are required, it is among railroad men.

How much we owe to these men, not only those upon the road, but those in the shops as well, for as a class they are deprived of their Sabbath and home comforts. Thus, it behooves us to do all we can to surround them with those influences that will tend to lead them into a higher and better life, which many times can but result in better morals, better workmen, and redeemed souls for Christ's Kingdom.

A GOSPEL MEETING IN THE RAILROAD SHOPS, DECATUR, ILL.

Under the direction of the Local Superintendent, Mrs. Kreidler, the members of the Decatur W. C. T. U. have held, for the past two years, weekly Gospel meetings in the carpenter shop of the Wabash yards, which have been well attended and full of interest. One outgrowth of this interest was manifested in the purchasing by the men of a "Baby organ," and they also have their own song-books. Mrs. Widdons, with a consecrated voice, gave her time and filled the place as organist, and her sweet spirit and singing aided in leading many to nobler desires.

To Miss Crissey is due the organizing of the Railroad Temperance Association, which now numbers 180 men, that are wearing the white R. R. T. A. button; her earnest words on the subject of total abstinence and prohibition, and the importance of proper education in the home, have led many to think seriously upon the subject of temperance in all things. Over half of the railroad corporations of the United States prohibit the use of intoxicating liquors among their employees, and many of them are prohibiting the use of tobacco on duty. Over 100,000 white buttons, with "R. R. T. A.," are now worn by railroad men.

Pastors of our various churches, with visiting evangelists, have from time to time given their services, expounding the Scriptures, and leaving with the men truths that would lift them to a higher manhood, and bring them to a saving faith. Hearts have been touched and led to righteousness, homes made happy, and God glorified.

Our personal experience has shown us, as a result of these noontide meetings, that the spirit of the Lord was present in convicting and converting power, which the following incident will verify. One of these men was living in sin, spending his Sabbaths reading novels, fishing, and in various forms of desecration. He was given to drinking and profanity. He was convicted of sin and finally yielded, striking his anvil for the last time for the devil, and he says, "I am striking it for Jesus now." Upon going home, he told his wife and children he was going to erect a family altar. Poor woman! She doubted the reality of the change; but the altar of prayer was erected, and burnt were the novels, and he took the Bible as his book. He invited us to hold a cottage prayer-meeting in his home. The wife was won to Christ, children were made happy, and the family is now regularly going to the house of the Lord for worship. This man is now a class-leader, and God uses him with power. His testimony is clear, and he is a living example of one "saved to the uttermost," testifying to the power of God to cleanse from every bad habit.

At different times, Gospel meetings were held in the R. R. Y. M. C. A. on Sabbath afternoons. On one of these occasions we had the pleasure of a Bible exposition from Rev. L. S. Coffin of Fort Dodge, Ia. Subject, "Our Father, and his love for humanity." Mr. Coffin has a wide acquaintance among railroad men, and has a deep interest in their welfare.

National R. R. Evangelist Miss Jennie Smith, of Washington, D. C., was with us ten days, holding services daily at the noon hour, with the men at the shops, and in the evening holding evangelistic meetings in one of the largest churches. Miss Smith captured the hearts of many by her loving, Christ-like simplicity in presenting the truth. Many new-born souls rejoiced in having found a personal Saviour. During her stay we also visited the hose-houses, and held meetings with the firemen, which they greatly appreciated. Much good resulted, and this work is being continued by the young people of the Epworth League, with the assistance of the pastors.

The average attendance of shop-men weekly is about forty-five. They manifest interest by giving marked attention and quietness, helping in song and often saying, "We are glad you came." Over five thousand leaflets and tracts have been distributed among the men, and sixty copies of the 1902 Christmas issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a gift apparently much appreciated.

The Union have placed eight literature boxes in the depots, streets, barns and hose-houses, thus endeavoring by great reading to help the passers-by. Over 45,000 papers were placed in them last year, and forty Scriptural motto calendars were given for the caboosses. On "Flower Mission" day, the Superintendent, Mrs. Kreidler, presented the seventy-five shop-men each with a bouquet of roses and carnations, also sending to the sick flowers, with greetings.

When God would not be mocked His Name,
He calls Himself "the great 'I Am'."
And leaves a blank where Christians may Insert those things for which they pray.

The Ideal Nurse

TEXT—I. TIMOTHY 5: 10:
"Well reported of for good works . . . if she have relieved the afflicted"

WELL, indeed, may a woman be reported of for good works, in such a world as ours, if she have relieved the afflicted. Such women are sorely needed. There is suffering everywhere, in the rich man's palace and the poor man's tenement. If any woman desires to be well reported of for good works, she can attain her ambition in no surer, better way than in relieving the afflicted. It is a glorious mission that has been chosen by these noble women, who are graduating as trained nurses, and are going forth in their striped uniforms, like valiant soldiers, to contend with fell disease. I want to present to you my conception of what such a woman should be, whether she stands by the operating-table, or bends over the invalid's bed, or walks through the wards of a hospital for contagious diseases, or sterilizes the surgeon's knives, just before the limb is to be amputated. Every year of my residence in Chicago, I have been asked by the officials of the different training-schools to speak upon this subject. I take this opportunity to address not a single graduating class of trained nurses, but to speak to all the different training-schools for nurses with which my pulpit comes into contact.

The scope of my theme can best be realized, if the hearer is led into the humble home of the most beloved and internationally honored of all women living at the present time. Who is she? I will answer that question by relating an incident which happened about the year 1858. Lord Stratford was entertaining at a London banquet many of the prominent military officers of the British Army, who had led to victory the Queen's soldiers in the Crimean conflict. As a matter of curiosity, the noble Lord asked them, one and all, this question: "Who do you think, of all the participants of the late war, will be the most honored and most revered by the coming generations?" He asked his guests to write the names of their choice upon slips of paper, and he would read the same and announce the result of the ballot. When the slips were collected, the vote was unanimous. Wonderful to state, the name which Lord Stratford announced was not that of a general. It belonged to an untitled woman. Her name was Florence Nightingale. Who was Florence Nightingale? She was not a Joan of Arc, or Marie Theresa, who achieved victories by the sword. She won her universal fame by the way she bound together the bleeding lips of the wounds which the surgeon's knife had opened. She carried in her hand not the battle-torn Union Jack, but the white bandage. She ignited no flame which burst forth from the cannon's mouth. She simply lighted a little candle, with which she went from ward to ward in the field hospitals, long after the tired men were asleep.

A Famous Nurse's Gift

Who was Florence Nightingale? I will tell you. She was the heroic nurse who did not want the British people to rear for her a monument of cold marble; but instead, she took the $250,000 which was a free-will offering given by her countrymen, and with it built and endowed, only a short distance from Westminster Abbey, the famous training-school for nurses which now bears her name. This school, established in 1860, is the foster-mother of all the modern training-schools for nurses. When a woman so honored by church and state as Florence Nightingale, thinks the development of the trained nurse a work so important that she devotes to it her fortune and her consecrated energies, we need make no apology for taking as our theme this morning, the qualities which are needed in the ideal nurse.

The trained nurse, in the first place, must be intelligent. She is the right arm of the physician. By that we do not mean that the trained nurse is to be a mere automatic machine, and that when the physician pulls the string she is to move, and when he stops pulling she is to stand still. Oh, no! She is to be far more. When Stonewall Jackson lay dying, after having been shot at Chancellorsville, Robert E. Lee turned to the messenger who brought him the sad news, and said: "Tell General Jackson he cannot, and must not die. If Stonewall Jackson dies, I shall lose my right arm." When Robert E. Lee said that, he did not assert that General Jackson had no brain, no thinking power, or that, as Lee's right arm, he merely obeyed the behests of Robert E. Lee's brain. He meant that Jackson was, in one sense, absolutely essential to him for the best organizing and development of the Southern armies, as well as for helping him in the laying out of a campaign. So we find that to-day, the intelligent trained nurse is more than the mere physical right arm of the physician: she is his eyes, his hands, his constant helper. What the intelligent trained nurse is able to report, in reference to the progress of the patient, to a great extent decides the physician's diagnosis. He sees the patient but once in twenty-four hours, while she is by the invalid's bed practically all the time. She can record the progress of the disease by the flight of minutes; he can only study it by the morning and the evening call. The value of the intelligent nurse is to be found in what she sees, as well as in what she is willing to do; her usefulness is to be enhanced by what she can tell, as well as by her willingness to obey orders.

A Nurse's Blunder

"It is high time," Florence Nightingale once wrote, "that the fallacy should be exploded, that every woman is able to become a competent nurse." It is high time that the standard of our training-schools for nurses should be raised, that unworthy institutions should be crushed out, and that the question of a trained nurse's efficiency should not be decided by her ability to buy a gingham dress and to read a thermometer. It is high time that the State legislatures should place laws upon the statute book, so that the graduates of these different institutions should be compelled to pass examinations for licensure, as the doctor, the pharmacist, the lawyer, or the locomotive engineer are compelled to do. Incompetent nursing has involved the loss of many a life, and caused many an agonizing pain. Some time ago a dear friend of mine—a brother minister—had his little five-year-old son nearly burned to death. The only way to save the child's life was by grafting human skin upon the little one's stomach and chest. The father and the child's two brothers volunteered to let the doctor peel the skin from their bodies to save the baby's life. After one of the brothers—a noble lad about ten years of age—had had the skin cut off his arms and shoulders and chest, the surgeon turned to the nurse and said, "Nurse, where did you get that knife?" "Out of the alcohol," she answered. "Did you then place the blade in sterile water before you gave it to me?" "No," she answered, "I did not know you wanted me to do it." "Then," said the surgeon, "we have cut all the skin off from this boy's body for nothing. Your criminal ignorance is to blame for this useless suffering. You should have known enough to place that knife in sterile water. You profess to be a trained surgical nurse and a graduate of a nurse's college." Thus, you women about to become trained nurses, it is of vital importance that you are intelligent and efficient. It is of vital importance that you should know the value of fresh air, and of proper dietetics. It is of vital importance that you obey the laws of cleanliness, and not allow your patient to become infected. The ignorance of incompetent nurses has sent many a patient to the grave. If you voluntarily enter your noble profession intellectually unqualified, you are committing a sin against the human race, just as surely as is the ignorant switchman, who throws open the wrong switch, and sends the passenger train crashing into the freight train, which has been side-tracked. "I did not know," in the sick-room, is about as criminal as "I did not think," or "I forgot." In this age of fine training schools for nurses, it is just as much every nurse's business to learn how to think right, as it is to learn how to do right.

Consecrated Nursing

The ideal nurse should be a Christian woman. During the dark night, when the black-winged Death Angel is hovering, wing-and-wing, beside the white-winged Birth Angel, or when, in the crisis of pneumonia or typhoid, the life seems to be hanging by a slender thread, no intelligent nurse is so competent to bend over the bed as the one who believes in God and prayer, and the one who can ask for the divine blessing when she pours out the medicine, or places the ice-bag on the fevered brow. A great deal of Florence Nightingale's power over her patients was due to the fact that she could tell the physically helpless and the dying about the Good Physician, who was able to cure the sufferer's soul as well as his body. The Crimean soldiers had a better chance for getting well in this world, when Florence Nightingale's mere presence made these rough men stop their swearing, and influenced many of them to turn their lips towards heaven with a beseeching prayer. We know that one of the beneficent tasks of a nurse is to inspire patients with peace of mind and of heart. Therefore, is not the ideal nurse doubly fitted for her work, when she can impart to the sufferer's soul a knowledge of the peace that passeth understanding?

Was that nurse's practical usefulness marred by her faith in God, about whom Dr. Banks relates this thrilling incident. During one of the bloody battles of the Civil War, a wounded youth was carried into the field hospital. He tossed upon his cot crying and moaning "Do not let me die! Oh, I am afraid to die! Oh, I am afraid to die!" The Christian nurse walked up to his side, and placed her hands firmly upon his shoulders. Then she said: "Boy, if you have to die, don't be a coward. Die like a man!" Then, after she had quieted him a little, she sat by his side, and began to tell him of that Christ who was waiting to be his Saviour whether he lived or died. After a while, tears of penitence rolled down the lad's cheeks. He put his faith in Christ. Then, with perfect confidence and trust in the divine forgiveness, like a little child, he went to sleep in his Saviour's arms. Do you not feel that a Christian nurse's practical usefulness is enhanced when, during the convalescing hours, she can talk upon the higher the spiritual themes of life, and send her patient forth from the sick room with noble aspirations to do right? You know, as well as I know, that much of the sickness of this world is due to the direct results of sin. Therefore, is it not in one sense essential for an ideal nurse to be a Christian woman, so that she may fight against the cause as well as the results of many sicknesses?

The Christian Armor

But there is another reason why the nurse should be a Christian woman. No young girl who enters this noble profession is morally and spiritually safe, unless she enters it with the divine arm of protection encircling her. We talk about the temptations which confront an average actor and actress. Mary Anderson, once the uncrowned queen of the American theatre, has warned young girls against the temptations. Actors like Edwin Booth would never allow their daughters to follow in their footsteps. Some of us would rather see our daughters dead than hear that they were going upon the stage. But the temptations of the stage have their counterpart in the perils, more subtle and no less menacing, of the nurse's career. The breaking of the home ties, the silence of the sick room, the evils of the hospital, the unprincipled lives of many physicians, and the perils which must necessarily arise in the discussion of certain cases, all conspire to overthrow the spiritual life of one who may have entered the nurse's profession with the highest and noblest of purposes. Ah, nurse, you realize only too well that the words of warning which I speak have a far-reaching and overpowering meaning. Therefore, if you are going to enter this profession in your own strength, I beg of you to stop, before it is too late. Better scrub in the kitchen, stand behind the counter, be a chambermaid, or anything that is honorable, however humble, rather than attempt to be a trained nurse without Christ by your side. As a noble, Christian woman, a trained nurse has the grandest opportunities for usefulness. As one who is not divinely protected, she is in weekly, and daily, aye, perhaps, in hourly danger of spiritual overthrow.

Essential Qualities

The ideal nurse should be a brave woman. The battlefield, with its storm of shot and shell, shows no greater percentage of loss of life than that found among the trained nurses in our contagious hospitals. The soldier who charges the enemy's breastworks is looking death in the face with no braver eye than the uniformed nurse who times the pulse of the small-pox patient, or the young girl who offers to go with the physicians into the quarantined city affected with yellow fever. Then there are the dangers which may affect the patients as well as the nurse, which result from delirium. The other day I read an account of a case in which the quick-witted bravery of a nurse saved the life of a raving patient, committed to her charge. Having stepped out of the room for a little, when she returned, she found the patient standing by his bed with a knife in his hand, ready to cut his throat. Instead of screaming or running away, she fixed her eye calmly upon his, as she said: "I would not cut my throat with such a dull knife as that, if I were you. Let me have it, I know where to get a sharper one." The delirious patient hesitated a moment. Then he handed it to her. Then she calmly turned and threw it out of the open window, as she said: "Now go back to bed, or else I will call for help to put you there." Ah, that was bravery. That was bravery as great as Lieutenant Cushing exhibited when he tried to blow up the iron-clad ram Albemarle at Plymouth, North Carolina, or as General Funston exhibited when, with a handful of followers, he invaded Aguinaldo's headquarters, and captured the chief of the Filipino armies. That is the kind of physical and moral courage which many nurses have to possess in order to fulfil the trying duties of their noble profession.

But there is another way in which the ideal trained nurse must prove her bravery. That is, when she has the moral courage to refuse to work for an incompetent physician. Sometime ago, one of the training-schools for nurses gave this question in an examination paper: "Supposing you positively knew that if you obeyed the doctor's orders, to give to your patient a certain medicine, which you knew would kill the patient, would you give it?" Most of the students answered, "No." Some answered, "Yes." I myself believe that neither answer fully covered the duty in the case. If there should come a time—and that time will come—when a competent nurse knows that her patient is being cared for by an incompetent physician, then that nurse should go to that doctor and tell him plainly what she knows, and then and there refuse to work any longer under his orders. She should do as an officer in the United States Army ought to do. As an officer in the army, I must obey my commander's orders. If I do not, then I am punished. But if I know that my commander is a drunken incompetent, or is following a fatally wrong policy, then I should have the moral courage to hand in my resignation, or to protest to the higher authorities. That is exactly what certain officers in the Spanish-American War did, in reference to their orders in Cuba. When the Washington War Department wanted to keep the American Army in Cuba, after Santiago had been captured, all the Generals wrote a public protest to the President, and that protest brought the army home. A trained nurse has no moral right to work under an incompetent physician. By doing so she becomes a party to his malpractice. She should not disobey his orders. She should refuse to work for him at all.

The ideal nurse should be a happy woman. Happy! Why? Because as King Solomon wrote, "A merry heart doeth good like a medicine." The rippling laugh makes the croaking owls, and the bats, and the vermin, which love to fly or walk or crawl about in the midnight gloom, flee for their lives. Happy! Why? Because good cheer is contagious as well as infectious. The nurse's smile in the sick room has the same curative qualities as the sun bath, or an alcoholic rub. And yet there are some nurses who go about their tasks with the gloomed visage of an undertaker's assistant, rather than with the radiant face of one who is trying to cheer up those who are pain-racked and depressed. They never seem to realize that a true nurse's facial expression should be full of sunshine, as well as her fingers' touch gentle and true.

But outside of her duty towards the patient, there is another reason why the ideal nurse should be happy. Her life is one of self-sacrifice. It is a life which has in it a sweet consciousness that she is trying to help her fellow-men. It is not a life of mere money-making, as many suppose. After the trained nurse has taken out her legitimate expenses, she has little money to save. It is a life of sweet and noble self-sacrifice. In 1876, Mr. H. C. Fahnestock, a wealthy merchant, gave $100,000 to endow a training-school for nurses, because he had seen two nurses tenderly care for his dying wife. He knew they were worth all the help that he gave. He knew that the ideal nurse, whom such an institution would develop, was a woman capable of self-sacrifice—a woman who trusts in Him who said: "He that loseth his life for my sake shall find it."

Oh, the transcendent joy of the Christian nurse's sacrifice for others! It is the same joy that came to that young girl of Doctor Keigwin's church at Wilmington, Delaware. Her little brother had a diseased limb. The flesh over the bruised bone would not heal. The doctors told the father that unless they could get some little child who was willing to have her flesh grafted onto his, he must die. The young sister heard what the doctors wanted. She offered to lie down and let her tender flesh be taken. The father refused. He felt that in the dangerous operation both children might die. She finally won his consent. There, for three long weeks, the little girl lay with her arm bound to her brother's, while the flesh was healing his wound. And during all the time, with a happy smile, she kept saying: "Brother is going to get well. Yes, my brother, because I am lying here, is going to get well." Young women who are about to enter the nurse's profession, if you are to become ideal nurses, this is to be your joy. You will be happy, because you will know that your sacrifice and devotion and faithfulness will save other lives. You will have the sweet consciousness that you have been able to lead a sufferer back from the dark valley of the Shadow of Death. Or, if you have to close the eyelids of the dead, you will know that you have been able to place their hands in the saving hand of Jesus. Christian women about to enter the noble profession of trained nurses, I congratulate you. I give to you a Gospel salutation. I wish you Godspeed.

I have chosen for my subject the "Ideal Nurse" for two reasons. First, I want to remove the prejudice which is harbored in many minds against hospitals and trained nurses. Some people think that a hospital is only an adjunct to a cemetery, and that a trained nurse is a hospital is not nearly so competent or faithful as the mother, caring for her sick child. How simple fact is, many a life would have been saved if the patient had been sent to a hospital, instead of being kept at home under the parent's charge. Some time ago I was called to see a young girl sick with pneumonia. The patient lay in a room that was damp and cold. The mother's every action proved she was incompetent to care for the invalid. I gently told her so, and suggested that she send her daughter to a hospital, where she could be properly cared for. She answered that that was what the doctor wanted her to do, but she could not and would not let her daughter be under any other care but her own. Within a few days the young girl died. I officiated at the funeral. They had a beautiful casket and plenty of flowers, but the whole service seemed to me a mockery. I do not say that neither killed her child; but I do say that if she had been taken to the hospital and received the right kind of treatment, the daughter might have recovered.

Secondly, I have preached this sermon because I want to throw wide open a door of usefulness for Christian women. Nursing is essentially women's work. It is as much a woman's work, as caring for a baby is a mother's work. Therefore, I want to show to young women a field in which they can, not only make an honorable living, but in which they can do an infinite amount of good. Sisters and daughters, Christian girls, it is time for some of you to stop learning to play upon the piano, when you have no musical talent, or try to paint upon china, when you have no artistic talent, and to learn to do something practical in the higher training schools for nurses. You will there find a womanly vocation.

May God bless to-day the memory of Florence Nightingale! And may the bandage and the nurse's cool hand upon the fevered brow ever be accompanied by the earnest Christian prayer of the ideal nurse.

THE REMARKABLE HISTORY OF A SUNDAY SCHOOL CLASS IN A CHICAGO CHURCH . . .

MISS EMMA VICK AND SOME OF THE MEMBERS OF HER FAMOUS SUNDAY SCHOOL "JEWEL" CLASS

DURING the year 1894, Miss Emma Vick, one of the lady teachers of the afternoon Sunday School of the Second Baptist Church, of Chicago, Ill., thought it would be a good plan to be a teacher in the morning school also, as this church had two sessions of Sunday School, one at 9 A.M., and the other at 2:30 P.M. She wanted a class that she could really call her own; not one given up by some other teacher, but, if possible, a new class. This she did not know how to go about. Her pupils in the afternoon school were young ladies, so she thought came to her, why not have a class of little girls in the morning school? How to get the little girls, and entirely new children, to the school, was the perplexing question.

The way was provided in this instance on the last Sunday evening of the old year. A number of little girls, between ten and twelve years old, went to church that evening, and occupied the rear gallery. Miss Vick went into the gallery that evening, and seeing so many girls, the thought came to her, "Now is your opportunity, improve it." She went to them, and asked each if she attended Sunday School anywhere, and if not, if she would like to attend the morning Sunday School. She obtained the names and addresses of five who were willing to come (this was the required number to form a new class in this school), and received their promise to attend on the first Sunday in the New Year, 1895. She wrote to each in the latter part of the week, reminding them of their promise. When the next Sunday came, Miss Vick sat near the church entrance to welcome them as they came in. The weather was very disagreeable, raining and snowing. Three out of the five came, the other two were sisters, and had moved to a distant part of the city, far away. This seemed a small beginning, but Miss Vick taught these three little girls to the best of her ability. In the spirit of love and sacrifice, she continued the work Sunday by Sunday, and day by day, working through the week in various ways to secure the promise and attendance of new scholars, and thus adding steadily to the membership of the class. It gradually increased until it had an enrollment of over sixty members, with an attendance averaging from twenty-five to forty each Sunday. The membership of the class to-day is forty-six, but instead of little girls they are now all young ladies, many being among those who joined during the year of the class organization.

Teacher and class love each other dearly, and God has caused this love to be interwoven into each of their lives. They are loyal and true-hearted to his cause, and to the cause of right everywhere and at all times. This class has always abounded in the sunshine of the Saviour's love. In the course of time, the name of "Jewels" (Mal. 3: 17) was chosen for the class and voted upon by them for its approval and adoption, and this name has been retained ever since. Then, too, they wanted to have class colors and a class motto, and finally decided upon the colors of purple and white—purple representing loyalty, and white, purity. The class button bears the single word "Jewels," in silver on a purple ground. They also chose as a class Scripture text, Prov. 3: 6.

An entertainment or a social is given each year by the class, to which everybody is invited. At the celebration in 1901 "Aunt Lizzie" Aiken was crowned "Queen of the Sunday School" at the advanced age of eighty-four years. Rewards are given each year for good attendance.

In the eight years of its existence the class has seen many of the girls give their hearts to the Saviour. Some are now in Sunday Schools elsewhere as teachers; seven united with the church last year by baptism and one by letter; three have united with the church by baptism this year, and others are preparing to confess their love for the Saviour in the near future. It is the chief aim of the class to win each and every member to a true Christian life.

Only one member has been separated from her classmates by death—Miss Lillian Anderson, a sweet Christian girl. Some have moved away, and some have been married and are in homes of their own, but the teacher endeavors to keep in touch with them in their new homes. Others have moved to distant parts of the city, but their love and loyalty for the class keeps them as faithful in attendance as they were when they lived near the church. Thus they continue to live and work for each other, and are kept together by the interwoven chain of God's love, which has been so wonderfully exemplified in their long class experience.

A Welcome Visitor

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD came to our home every week of last year, not only as a welcome and interesting paper, but especially as a Christian friend, guide and instructor. It is a paper for old and young, for Sunday school teacher and Christian worker, for parents and children. It is uplifting and encouraging to the homeless and the fallen. The Red Letter Bible is just as represented. My wife and I desire to express our gratitude to you for making God's own dear Word, the Bible, look so beautiful, so durable, so inviting, as in this exquisite example of the printers' art, and so cheap. I am sure our heavenly Father will reward THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the noble work it does at home and abroad. The "Family Art Gallery" is a fine collection of pictures.

MR. AND MRS. A. J. RHYNSBURGER.

"Good for Boys"

I received your premium, The Speaking Oak, before we left Port Huron, and it is such fine, good reading—just what I like for my boy. This book, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, is more than worth the two dollars asked. (MRS.) BELL MCCORMICK.

A Song of the Oak

"The Speaking Oak is a book worth having," writes Mr. Alfred Blauvelt, of Tenafly, N. J. "The name suggests a fine ballad, that I give you from memory. An Englishman—a bootmaker from London—used to chant it to me thirty or forty years ago:

A song of the oak, the brave old oak,
Who hath stood in the green-wood long;
Here's health and renown to his broad green crown,
And his fifty arms so strong.
There is fear in his frown when the sun goes down,
And the fire in the West fades out;
Then still flourish he, a tree of the free,
While a hundred years are gone.

This book, with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD one year, two dollars.

"A Messenger"

I could not dispense with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It is a messenger of God bearing healing in its wings.

Gospel Singer Sankey Threatened WITH Blindness

THE SANKEY HOME IN BROOKLYN

MR. SANKEY, HIS DAUGHTER-IN-LAW AND GRANDCHILDREN

THE COUNTRY HOME AT EASTPORT, L. I.

READERS of this journal who are familiar with the spiritual work of Mr. Ira D. Sankey, the singing evangelist and life-long companion and associate of the late D. L. Moody, will regret to learn that Mr. Sankey has, for several months past, been in enforced retirement in consequence of an affection of the eyes. The famous Gospel singer and hymn writer, whose voice has delighted vast audiences throughout the world, is now practically blind. He is living quietly with his family in Brooklyn, and is under the care of expert physicians and oculists, who hope to be able to restore the sight of one of his eyes. The vision of the other is probably darkened forever.

MR. AND MRS. SANKEY AND GRANDCHILD

Mr. Sankey's affliction has been one of slow progress. Two or three years ago, his fine constitution and robust frame seemed to defy fatigue. He was a tireless worker, and never spared himself when there was a call to give the Gospel in speech or song. After the death of Mr. Moody, Mr. Sankey's burden of labor was practically doubled. He preached, and he sang the sweet songs of salvation, and undertook long and exhausting journeys in the interest of the Gospel work. His health was rugged, and he drew upon his strength in many ways that would have quickly broken down other men. About two years ago, the strain began to tell upon him, and he became ill. Still he clung to his work, and whether at home or abroad, he preached and sang, night after night, paying no heed to friendly warnings that he was overtaxing his strength. He would not leave his post while he felt able to either sing or to speak. His eyes, which had given him more or less trouble for some time previous, became seriously affected. He ceased evangelistic work altogether, hoping that rest and retirement might assist in effecting a cure.

Some time ago, his condition became so serious that an operation was decided upon. This was performed under the direction of Dr. Kalish, and the result was a reasonable hope that the sight of one eye, at least, might be saved. The other eye is in a less hopeful condition, and may remain permanently sightless. Mr. Sankey's affliction is known as "glaucoma," a very serious disease, which often causes absolute blindness.

These particulars concerning Mr. Sankey are furnished by his son, Mr. Allan Sankey, who is his constant companion. The following announcement is made by his attending oculist, which presents the exact condition of the case to-day:

"Mr. Sankey first came under my care about two months ago suffering from an attack of congestive glaucoma, caused, undoubtedly, in this case, by physical exhaustion from overwork. This disease is due to an increase in the tension within the eyeball, which, if not reduced, causes wasting of the optic nerve, and abolition of sight. The operation necessary to reduce this pressure was performed as soon as the condition of the eyes permitted. He rallied at once, the pain and suffering being relieved; but it is now too soon to express a definite opinion as to the result of the operation. In the right eye, the existing conditions are not unfavorable to the recovery of a moderate amount of sight, which will probably be accentuated by improvement in his general health. The left eye has not responded to treatment, as the other has done, and at this time any anticipation that sight in this eye will be restored is hardly justifiable.

(Signed) RICHARD KALISH."

Ira D. Sankey, the sweetest of America's Gospel singers, was born in Edinburg, Pa., August 28, 1840. Ever since his seventeenth year, when he was converted, he has been identified with Gospel work in church and Sunday School, but especially in the service of song. Mr. Sankey has sung the message of salvation to the hearts and souls of men in almost every land under the sun. The story of his long association with Mr. Moody in whose company he has crossed oceans and continents and held vast audiences spellbound by the charm of his voice, is too well known to need recapitulation here. The prayers of God's people everywhere will rise, that he may be restored to health and usefulness.

THE EVANGELIST AS A FISHERMAN AT EASTPORT, L. I

MRS. SANKEY ON THE MOUNT OF OLIVES

MR. SANKEY ON THE GRAND CANAL, VENICE

THE EVANGELIST SINGING ON "DAVID'S TOWER," JERUSALEM

ACROSS FINLAND IN SLEDGES

FROM Kajana, in the very heart of the remote famine districts of Finland, this cable message comes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from its editor, Dr. Klopsch, who is still engaged in his mission of personally investigating famine conditions and the methods of relief work.

Kajana is the northern section of the lake district, and has been a centre of extreme suffering. Other places in the same section are Idensalmi, Sotkamo and Hyrynsalmi, from which letters have come bringing tales of general suffering and destitution among the peasants. Uleaborg, which will next be visited, is northwest of Kajana, on the shores of the Gulf of Bothnia. It has been an active centre of relief work during the present famine, and the neighboring towns and villages have, with its help, been fighting a brave battle with starvation.

Dr. Klopsch's announcement, that he found the reports of suffering fully confirmed, proves that the relief measures so extensively organized, were amply justified. The means at the disposal of the Central committee, and the local relief committees in Finland, are now probably sufficient to supply food to the starving thousands in the remote districts. The recent situation in Kajana and the surrounding neighborhood is very vividly described in letters that have been received by Finlanders living in the United States.

A well-known citizen of the town of Kajana, writes to the Uusi Suometar, the leading Finnish newspaper at Helsingfors, describing the recent condition before the arrival of relief, as follows, viz.:

Very few persons living in other provinces of Finland know how miserable the outlook is here. A man came to me some days ago. He had just been visiting Ristijarvi and Hyrynsalmi, two parishes in the neighborhood, and had many astonishing facts to relate. In the Ristijarvi there were fourteen dead children, whose bodies still awaited interment. Still more appalling was the situation in Hyrynsalmi, where nineteen dead children were unburied. Those children did not die of hunger, but of measles or small-pox. That is true; but would it have been possible that so many would have died had it not been that they were starving before contracting disease? Would it have been possible that so many fell ill, unless hunger had previously weakened them?

It is said that out of the forty children which were taken into the Children's Home at Hyrynsalmi, which was founded by the Central Relief Committee, nearly twenty died in one month, and half of the children in the Children's Home at Ristijarvi are sick at present. The same kind of reports are received from Paltamo. The forty children taken into the Children's Home at Hyrynsalmi constitute about four per cent. of the total number in that parish, and if nearly half of those taken into the Home have died.

This letter, like that which follows, was translated by Mr. J. H. Jasberg, Secretary of the Finnish Central Relief Committee of the United States, for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The second letter, from a Finnish pastor at Sotkamo, says, in part:

Sotkamo has a vast area, inhabited by about 9,000 people. The surface of the country is very hilly, with high, broad ridges in it. On these broad heights are the poorly-built dwellings, for the high-land soil is more fertile, though it is rocky. About the dwellings are the productive fields, but small as compared with those of other parts of Finland. The coast is thinly settled, because the soil is too rocky. About half of the population, or 4,500, are working people, without farms of their own, and farm-tenants are few. The dwellings of the tenants and those not owning small farms are small, low cottages, in which the dwellers abide in compactness.

Some one calls for a minister to come to the bedside of a patient. The scene is in winter. In the summer the journey to be described is mostly made by rowboat or on foot. An old man is ill in a cottage. A sleigh is borrowed from Rupukka, a horse from Hepolahti, and a large sleighbell from Pulikka—the names are not products of the writer's imagination, but are a reality. The journey goes to Sapson and to Kianta Lake.

After describing the journey, the writer continues:

I descend from the sleigh, and in a stooping position pass through the door into the hut, albeit I am not a tall man. On a bench near the fireplace lies a patient. A table, a long bench along the wall, and a smaller one constitute the furnishings of the interior. Half a dozen children stare at the new-comer. Each wears a ragged sack-cloth shirt; these are their only clothes. The eldest is ten years of age.

These children, with their large abdomens and thin legs, filled my heart with sympathy, and made me think of the many, many mothers, who provide their well-fed children with pretty clothes, covered with embroideries and lace. The scene described is very general in the interior of the country.

A FINNISH FAMILY OF THE ULEABORG DISTRICT

Dr. Klopsch Cables the Result of his Tour in the Famine Districts

KAJANA, FINLAND.

CHRISTIAN HERALD, NEW YORK: I have just completed a five days' tour on sledges across the snow, and I find the reports of famine and suffering fully corroborated. I will start again to-day, and on Thursday will be at Uleaborg.

LOUIS KLOPSCH.

[Three days later, $10,000 was cabled to Uleaborg at Dr. Klopsch's request, to be used in the local relief work and for the surrounding districts.]

Mr. Willets Describes the Tour

ULEABORG, FINLAND, March 14

Five thousand persons, including two thousand school children, serenaded THE CHRISTIAN HERALD party here at noon to-day, bringing tributes of flowers and song as an expression of gratitude and appreciation of America's loving sympathy for Finland, in her time of trouble.

Our journey through Finland on sledges and by rail penetrated to all the important points. Everywhere we were received with demonstrations of welcome and gladness, and the joy of the Finnish people found expression in song. Our parting serenade at Helsingfors station, when we left for the interior, was particularly touching. The world's most famous male chorus sang, and five thousand Finlanders, men and women, joined in the musical ovation—a tribute to Christian America. They literally covered our party with flowers. GILSON WILLETS.

THANKS FROM FINLAND

The Finnish Central Relief Committee at Helsingfors, has sent the following cable message to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

HELSINGFORS, March 11.

CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York:

Please convey to the American people, heartfelt thanks in behalf of Finland, for the generous relief already afforded. (Signed) SALTZMAN, Chairman Central Relief Committee.

granted to twenty-five communes, including Kajana, Haspaijarvi, Knussamo, Jawalkoski, Tudasjarvi, Mohos, Iltajarvi, Turtola, and Kolari.

Many idle will now be employed. The Governors of Abo and Bjorneborg have proposed to the Senate that 18,500 marks be expended in improvements at Lake Wusnijarvi, in order to employ the idle in Tarkano, and also 27,000 marks on the Siloneva Swamp, and 37,000 on the Sarkkineva Swamp. These are mentioned as illustrating the relief methods that are now being employed. 15,500 marks have been appropriated to repair the flood damages in the Nyby and Pedalaks districts. In the latter district men could not be found to do the work desired, although called by advertisement and in the churches.

Many Finnish ladies are taking an active part in the relief work and rendering excellent service. Among them are Misses Elin Olander (Puldarno), Alphild Hallmerus (Kuhmoniemi), Anna Leskinen (Nurmes), Miss Gauffin (Sotkamo), and Miss Naemi Bondsdorff (Ivars). These self-sacrificing young women do not hesitate to go in and out among the famine sufferers and nurse the sick, even at peril to themselves.

Mr. A. Sandstrom, of Suanussalmi, has visited the famine-stricken sections of the Russian Karel and reported on the condition of affairs there to the Uleaborg authorities. The latter, having a balance of relief funds in hand from the last famine in the Karel, authorized Mr. Sandstrom to make the necessary expenditures. He distributed 138 sacks of flour among the starving in seven villages, but says much more will be needed. In two other villages he gave to the sufferers twenty-eight sacks. These people are usually unable to perform any work, and indeed none is to be had, so the relief is distributed as an absolute gift. These and many similar instances show that where the people are sick, or where work is unobtainable, food is not withheld, although it is the policy of the relief managers to impose work as a condition of receiving relief, wherever this is practicable.

News from Sweden, though brief, is far from encouraging. The bitterness of the famine still seems to be widely felt in the land. A governor of one of the northern provinces of Sweden, writes thus:

"If good and merciful friends, of their great abundance, will 'present either money or other things, it will be received with greatest thankfulness, and I will always follow the expressed wishes of the donor.

CARL J. BERGSTROM, Governor."

It is now more than probable that all famine needs in Finland will soon be supplied. At the present time, indications are that requirements at relief headquarters, with the funds now in hand and on the way, will be ample for urgent needs. In Sweden, however, there is still much suffering, as the above message indicates. Contributions for relief work in Sweden may be addressed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and will be duly acknowledged and forwarded to the Relief Committee in Stockholm.

A Plea for Ostracism

IN a recent address to wealthy Roman Catholic ladies in New York, a prominent priest made a remarkable plea. He asked them to become the leaders of a movement to ostracize persons who obtain divorces, and especially persons who, after divorce, contract another marriage. He confessed that the churches were powerless to raise a breakwater against the flood of divorces, but he thought the ban of society might succeed, where the churches fail. It must have caused the preacher some humiliation to ask the world to go to the aid of the church in a matter of social morality, and he must have had a depressing consciousness of the futility of his plea. It is among the wealthy classes, and among people socially prominent, that divorce is most prevalent. To ask them to close their doors against the sinners, is therefore to ask them to exclude from society persons with whom they are closely connected, either by blood or friendship. Even if they complied with his request, it is doubtful if the effect would be potent. Persons who desire divorce are not likely to be restrained by fear of social ostracism, and they are now becoming so numerous that they could easily form a circle of their own, the company of which we could imagine their finding congenial.

It is not by any such means that the evil of divorce will be remedied. As a rule, those who fear not God do not regard man. The virus is too deep for any such means of cure. As we have seen in cases that have occupied public attention recently, the divorce is merely the outward evidence of widespread corruption. When wrong becomes intolerable, or when it is detected and exposed, the divorce comes, but the evil precedes all that. It originates in the corrupt mind, which often feeds on corrupt literature and on foul French plays, and would flourish even if divorce were put under the ban of society, or abolished altogether. It is only when society turns to God, and seeks the purifying influences of the Holy Spirit, that we can hope for reformation.

Russia and the Famine

THAT Russia is now thoroughly awake to the serious character of the famine situation in Finland, and is putting forth all her energies in an earnest effort to check the suffering, is news that will be everywhere welcomed. It is announced that the Czar, feeling compassion for the afflicted peasants, and doubtless influenced by the sympathy displayed in their behalf by the American people and other foreign nations, has personally taken up their cause. Under imperial direction, a vast relief scheme is projected, which involves an expenditure of not less than $3,000,000 in public works of various kinds, loans to farmers, and for seed supplies for planting. When these plans are in full operation, it is believed that there will be work for every able-bodied man now out of employment, and that by this policy, the impoverished Finns will be able to surmount the present distress, and to live and labor on, in the hope of better times.

As far as can be learned at this writing, the imperial relief plan, which is supplemented by relief appropriations from the Finnish Senate, contemplates expenditures aggregating about $3,800,000, and include these items:

Idensalmi-Kajana railway	$700,000
Uleaborg-Tornea railway	300,000
R. R. construction loan	2,000,000
Bank for farmers' loans	800,000
The Finnish Senate has appropriated:
For public works	$375,000
For grain seed (to be sold at cost)	500,000
For cottage industries	75,000
For relief in various provinces	500,000

With the exception of the last-mentioned sum, these are all independent of the relief work. There are four Relief Committees—two in St. Petersburg and two in Helsingfors. In Helsingfors, one is the Finnish Central Committee, the other that under Governor Bobrikoff. In St. Petersburg, the chief committee is that under Admiral Kraemer, which works in harmony with and through the Central Committee of Helsingfors, to whose work the Czar has already personally contributed $5,000, and the Czarina a like amount.

This far-reaching relief scheme is itself the best answer to those who have charged Russia with indifference to the fate of Finland's peasantry. But while there is no reason to doubt that it will be carried through to the utmost detail, or that it will be effective, as the expenditures will be controlled largely by native Finnish officials, it should not be forgotten that such extensive projects mature slowly. Dr. Klopsch, who has just made a long journey on sledges across the snows to the interior provinces, cables a confirmation of the reports of distress and starvation, proving that the earlier statements, received in letters from Finland, were nowise exaggerated. He has paid from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund $10,000, to relieve the distress in the Uleaborg district, where there are 50,000 famine sufferers. With outside help, the local committees and their bands of relief workers will struggle on. But the fight will no longer be hopeless; for they know that if the people can be kept alive and fed until the larger succor comes, the battle will be won.

To all who, by their prayers and their gifts, helped Finland in her hour of need, we extend cordial congratulations on this brighter outlook. Already the food procured with your gifts has stayed the famine, and saved lives in many a Finnish peasant home. When Russia's splendid liberality comes into play, your duty will be done. Like a phalanx of tried Christian veterans, you led the forlorn hope, and held back the gaunt battalions of hunger and disease while the relief reserves were on the way. And if, when the famine has become a thing of the past, there should be no gloomy death-roll to remember with sorrow, as in former famines in Finland, that consoling thought alone, and the knowledge that, under divine blessing, you were made instrumental in averting such a calamity, will be a sufficient reward for all you have done for the peasants of Finland.

The Soul's Life and Light

IT was Thoreau who remarked that it would be a dreadful thing if, when our time comes to die, we should suddenly realize that we had not lived!

There are two kinds of life: the one natural, the other spiritual. Unless one has actually entered upon the spiritual life—the life of faith and willing service, of obedience and sacrifice, of self-denial, of one-ness with God in Christ—he cannot be said to live.

The Christian who is walking worthy of the calling wherewith he is called, in whom the Holy Spirit dwells as in his own chosen temple, flooding all its chambers with his light divine—how can the spiritual life in such a Christian be hid? No man could carry the sun in a dark lantern; it would drive itself out by the intensity of its light.

A man or woman whose heart is really radiant cannot help showing it everywhere, in the car, on the street, in the office, at the sea-shore or in the mountains, in the parlor or in the kitchen. There are insects that fly at night, phosphorescing light at will, flashing and closing, and so there are Christians that flash out on Sunday and shut up all the week. That sort of light can be hid. But not the other sort.

You go into your garden and collect a handful of fragrant leaves and blossoms—this leaf of geranium, and that leaf of sweet-scented verbena; this blossom of mignonette, and that of Arabian jessamine—and carrying them in your hand, in an abstracted mood, at last you put them heedlessly in your pocket. They are now hid. You return to the house, and directly the little prattler comes running about you, and says: "What you got?" "I have got nothing," you say. Presently others come around you, and commence sniffing and saying: "You have a perfume about you." You cannot keep the secret. Those fragrant leaves and blossoms, though concealed, send out a fragrance, which others certainly recognize.

Men and women and children, who have begun to live the spiritual life, have something of Christ's gentleness and humility and kindness and purity, which they cannot keep secret. The fragrance of it will diffuse itself, whether they declare it or not. It will go wherever they go, and make itself manifest. Their light will shine and their lives will declare to all men the Master whom they serve.

TO FIND THE DATE OF EASTER

EASTER is a movable feast: in different years it is celebrated on different days. If the average person were asked why the 12th of April was chosen as Easter Day this year, he would probably have no more satisfactory answer than that it was so fixed in the almanac. A person of inquiring mind, however, is very apt to ask by what process the almanac people decided that April 12 was the right time. The churchman would refer him to the Prayer-book, where he would find rules and tables for the determination of Easter for every year of the Christian era. Confronted by what seems to him a mixed conglomeration of Golden Numbers, Epacts and Dominical Letters, more than likely he would be glad to turn away to some less complicated and more interesting puzzle.

Let us see, then, if we can construct for ourselves a table of reference, which will indicate Easter Day for any particular year. The rule in force among all Christian nations is this: "Easter day is always the first Sunday following the full moon which happens upon or next after the 21st of March; and if full moon happens upon a Sunday, Easter Day is the Sunday after." But what makes the determination so difficult, is that the "moon" referred to in the rule is the calendar moon, which, although on the average much the same as the true moon in the heavens, yet at any particular time may differ from it by one or even two days. The reason for adopting this average moon in place of the true moon, was that otherwise full moon would occur at different times in different parts of the world, and hence Easter would not be universally observed on the same day.

Seeing, then, instead of the true moon it is some fictitious moon that governs the appointment of Easter Day, we must learn something about the occurrence of its chief phases before we can attempt to invent an Easter table. Some centuries ago, the ecclesiastical authorities hit upon a very clever arrangement, whereby the lunations of their calendar moon were made to agree very nearly with those of the true moon. This was accomplished by making use of a certain well-known law which had been discovered by Meton, an Athenian, who flourished in the fifth century before Christ. He had made known to the world that the moon completes 235 revolutions (or lunations, as they are generally called), in exactly 19 years. Here, then, was the groundwork for the ecclesiastical calendar. Every period of 19 years was made to consist of 235 moons or months; some years had 12, others 13 months. The beginning of every month in this calendar was called new moon; and the fourteenth day was full moon. The first Metonic Cycle of 19 years was supposed to commence with the 1st of January, 1 B.C.; for on that day there was actually new moon. It must be particularly observed that, in corresponding years of different cycles, the dates of new moon (and of full moon), will be the same. So, in order to discover on what days of the month in any year full moon will happen, it is only necessary to find what number that year is in the Metonic Cycle. This number is known as the Golden Number—so called, it is said, because in the old calendars it was printed in gold. Since 1 B.C. is the first year of the first cycle, 1 A.D. is the second year, and its golden number is 2; 5 A.D. is the sixth year, and its golden number is 6; 19 A.D. is the first year of the second cycle, and its golden number is 1. The general rule may be enunciated thus: To the number of the year in the Christian era add 1, and divide by 19, the remainder will be the required golden number for the year. Consider, for instance, the present year 1904, divided by 19, leaves as remainder 4, which the reader may find given in the almanac as the golden number.

If we tabulate the dates of full moon for all the years of one Metonic Cycle, we can see at a glance the date of full moon for any year, after finding its golden number. To illustrate the method of using the Easter Table, we will determine the date of Easter for the year 1947. The golden number (found by dividing 1948 by 19), is 10. In the second column of the golden numbers 10 is placed opposite to April 5, which is, therefore, the date of full moon. Now from a perpetual calendar, we find that April 5, 1947 is a Saturday, Hence, in the year 1947 Easter will be celebrated on Sunday, the 6th of April.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

A Unique African City

ONE of the most remarkable cities in Western Equatorial Africa has just been occupied by a British expedition. It is Kano, the chief city of the Niger country on the south of the Great Desert. Travelers describe the city as one of the most populous and thriving of that part of Africa. A high wall, fifteen miles in circumference, surrounds the nucleus of houses and public buildings and encloses also a large tract of cultivated land on the north, east and west. Large crops of Indian corn, wheat, rice and other cereals are raised there, besides an excellent quality of cotton. It is also an important manufacturing centre. The cotton is woven into a cloth dyed with indigo and commands a ready sale throughout the Soudan, where it is preferred to any other fabric. A species of leather is another article of commerce produced in Kano. It is made chiefly of the skin of goats and sheep, and is so skilfully tanned by a process of hand beating that it becomes soft, and is much sought for hand-bags, slippers, pocket-books, the covering of boxes and other purposes. It closely resembles morocco, and is often used as a substitute for it. Many other minor industries are carried on in the city. Yet, a singular feature of its life is that there are no large factories, but each article is made in the homes of the workers. A daily market is held, which is a very busy scene, and once a year there is a grand fair, to which merchants go from all parts of Africa. It is not at all uncommon for more than a million persons to assemble at this fair, which continues several days. The inhabitants are chiefly Hausas and Fulahs. The former are the workers and merchants; the latter are warriors and slave-stealers. They are, however, the governing class, and hold the Hausas in contempt, as inferior beings. The Fulahs are the aristocracy. Since the country came under British "protection," stringent orders have been issued against the slave raids; but the Fulahs have disregarded them. An explorer who visited Kano last year, saw a huge cage full of men, women and children, who were being sold like cattle, at the fair. Whatever may be thought of the morality of the "protectorates" established in Africa by European Powers, it will be matter for rejoicing if England, according to her usual custom, sternly suppresses this horrible traffic in Nigeria, and in this particular justifies the Apostolic conception of government.

He is the minister of God to thee for good; but if thou do that which is evil, be afraid for he beareth not the sword in vain (Rom 13:4).

Russian Reforms

The decree issued by the Emperor Nicholas of Russia, on March 12, is the most momentous document for the Russian people that has been penned since the famous ukase, liberating the serfs, was signed by the Emperor's grandfather, Alexander II., in 1861. The latter decree set free 23,000,000 slaves. The decree now signed gives practical religious liberty to the whole Russian people and at the same time gives a measure of civil liberty which is a step toward constitutional government. There is the more hope that the concession will prove workable, because it is not altogether an innovation, but is an extension of existing institutions and a removal of restrictions which have hitherto crippled local self-government. New powers are given to the Zemstvos, or Provincial Assemblies, and they will have greater freedom in proposing necessary reforms. Besides this, the peasants are to be released from their present liability to perform forced labor. The peasant is apparently to be treated as an individual, and not as part of the commune. This is an important reform, because, hitherto, the taxes were gathered from the commune, and the industrious, thrifty peasants had to make up the deficiency created by idle members, who failed to pay their taxes. These details, with other reforms, are submitted to the Provincial Councils, which are directed to make suggestions as to their execution, in order that the Emperor may be informed. We in this country cannot fully appreciate all that these changes mean to the Russian people; but the joy that has been manifested throughout the Empire shows how welcome are the boons that have been granted. One significant expression in the Czar's decree is that he "is irrevocably decided to satisfy the needs for which the State has become ripe." This is an intimation to all whom it may concern, that the Emperor does not intend to be thwarted in the measures he has adopted. It is no secret that while the nobles and the people are in favor of this extension of civil and religious liberty, the vast official class is violently opposed to it. The governors of provinces, in many instances, stifled the inquiries which the Emperor instituted before he decided on this measure. These officials have evidently now reached the limit of resistance to the will of the autocrat and his people, and will continue their opposition at their peril. We admire the courage of the young Emperor, who is evidently fully aware how numerous and powerful are the enemies he is making in this effort to liberate his people. We hope he will persist in it, for it is just the kind of work on which a blessing is promised by the prophet:

THE DWELLINGS AND PUBLIC BUILDINGS OF THE CITY OF KANO

Seeing Without Eyes

A French journal publishes a story that is received among scientists with general incredulity, but which the journal insists is strictly true. It is that a system has been discovered by which a blind man, or one whose eyes are covered, can actually see. It appears that Prof. Stems, studying the principle of the telephone, conceived the idea that a power which could bring sounds from long distances to the ear, might also bring the sight of objects to the brain without the use of the eye. His theory is that it is not the eye that sees, but the brain. The eye is simply the medium of sight. Proceeding from that basis, he argued that if the image of any object could be transmitted to the brain directly, without the use of the optic nerve, the image would be seen. The professor invented an apparatus which he places on the temples of a blindfolded person, and immediately that person sees any object brought near to him. An experiment made on Dr Caze, one of the professor's colleagues, is described by the French journal. It states that Dr Caze was blindfolded, and taken into a dark room. The apparatus was put on his head, and he gradually became conscious of every article in the room, and stated accurately the number of fingers held up at any kind can now be obtained on the installments of one Pence.

Rev E. Payson Hammond has been holding services in New York at the Seventeenth Street M. E. Church. During the past fortnight he held at Williamsburg, L. I., Dr. Hall the pastor of the church, issued a notice of his own now the pastor of a large church in the West, was among unconverted people. And as a result under Mr. Hammond's influence. He also says that at Monmouth, Ill., where Mr. Hammond held meetings some years ago, he found many young people and children who had grown up and been taken into Christian work who were converts then made, still are.

A Waiting Bride

A young lady in a small town in New Jersey is having a trying experience. Some three years ago her brother was making a tour on the Pacific Coast. She corresponded with him during his travels, and one day, while staying with an old friend in Los Angeles, Cal., a letter from the sister was delivered to him. In it was a photograph which his sister had just received from a photographer. He showed it to his host, who became deeply interested in it, and asked many questions about the character and disposition of the young lady. The guest was enthusiastic in praise of his sister, and eventually a correspondence was begun which has continued ever since. It grew more and more cordial, until it resulted in an engagement of marriage. The young man, however, was prevented by pressing business from coming East to be married, so he pleaded with the girl to go to California for the ceremony. Ultimately he won her consent. A day was fixed on which she was to start on her journey. He promised to send before that day a check in payment of her expenses. The bridal trousseau was packed, and on the morning of the day appointed she sat on her trunk awaiting the coming of the letter-carrier, who, she felt sure, would bring the expected letter. But no letter or check came, and her disappointment was acute. Her friends have lost faith in the young man, but the expectant bride still believes that the delay has been accidental, and will be short. It may be hoped that her confidence will be justified. She sets an example to some Christians, who, in spite of the promises of One who never fails, have ceased to expect the coming of their Lord:

Saying, Where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep all things continue as they were from the beginning (II. Peter 3:4).

BRIEF NOTES

Sir Isaac Pitman, the inventor of Pitman's shorthand, was at one time a local preacher and class-leader in Methodism, which he joined in his youth.

Mr. John R. Mott, General Secretary of the World's Student Christian Federation, and of the Student Department of the American Young Men's Christian Association, has started on a tour around the World. He is in Australia and New Zealand, where he will meet the student bodies and colleges for the second time.

Christians of all denominations are requested that the week April 12-19 next has been designated as "Lord's Day Week," when it is hoped all Christians will give more attention than usual to the observance of the Sabbath, and to the duties and claims of the Lord's Day as the consecration of Christ's friends and liberty.

The Continental Committee of the 1900 Congress which was organized for the purpose of carrying on the work of the Congress, has left the preliminary arrangements for the Congress of 1903 to be held in Toronto, Canada, in June next.

A Habit of Finding Fault

THE most inveterate fault-finder I ever saw, flatly denied that he was even critical. We are often strangely blind to our own defects, strangely unwilling to admit that we have any. The trouble is that the fault-finder is often not on his guard, and the tendency to complain creeps on one; like malaria, is stealthy in its approaches, and is in the character before its presence is recognized. What do you and I find fault with, in the home, for example? Often with what we have to eat. Either it is not the special viand we crave, or it is too hot or too cold, too fat or too lean, too wet or too dry, too thick or too thin, too something to please our overfastidious taste. The lady at the head of the table sighs; it is a thankless task to cater for a fault-finding husband or fault-finding children. The maid in the kitchen, who is independent, and who can leave when her month is up, gives warning; the pleasure of the meal is spoiled, all because a person, who should have known better, indulged himself in calling attention to flaws, instead of praising successes.

If the fault-finders, who devote themselves to scolding about the table, could only be deported in a body to Finland, or Norway, or Alaska, could know for a few weeks the pinch of hunger, the torment of real gnawing, wolf-like famine, they might be cured of this evil habit.

One sees a child or a young woman fretful and fault-finding about clothes. Love of dress in some girls amounts to a passion. Not satisfied with garments that are whole, neat and comfortable, the desire is for what is rich, elegant and showy. Also for many changes of raiment. When these wishes must be denied, there is fault-finding.

Many people find fault because they have not enough money to meet their needs, not considering that by economy and simplicity they could make money go farther. A flat pocket-book often makes a fretful countenance. The boys and girls, not knowing the father's anxiety, or the mother's trial, fly from the atmosphere which is so freighted with gloom. They are afraid to speak or to move, lest they shall awaken displeasure, yet they are not to blame.

In the morning when we rise, may we not wisely call on God for help to keep us from this one sin of foolish, useless, wasteful, idle and thankless finding of fault?

Don't Snub Your Boy

Fathers are greater sinners in one regard than mothers. Often they fail to understand and appreciate the sensitiveness of the growing boy, the boy who at sixteen swells with importance, and feels himself a man. A lad's conceit at that turning-point in life is often amusing, but it is part of nature's effort to equip him for the race, and to snub it, or the boy for showing it, is both foolish and cruel. Do men not recall the fact that they were once boys themselves?

Old Letters

People who have the habit of keeping their friend's letters would do well to consider whether or not they would like others to read them after they are themselves gone. If, in a letter, there is anything, whatever, that you or your friend would prefer no other eyes to see, destroy the letter now. Do not leave it to the haphazard of the thing that may come to pass after your death. When a letter has been several times perused, and answered, burn it. Considerations of sentiment to the contrary, letters are somewhat useless lumber.

Back Views

Did you ever stop to think how much character is expressed in a back? Stubbornness is indicated by the set of some shoulders. You do not need to see the man's face. His obstinacy, even his pugnacity, are revealed by the look of his back as you sit behind him. And a whole life story of disappointment and drudgery may be read in the resigned way in which some tired women sink into a seat, the head thrust forward and the shoulders curving in. A strong and vigorous personality is indicated by an erect, flat back, showing force in reserve, and plenty of physical power and courage.

An Act of Gallantry

The train had pulled out from Hoboken heavily loaded. Newark was the first station-stop. In one of the cars, near the door, sat an Italian peasant women with a babe in her arms, an older babe at her side, and a child of four clinging to her skirt. She was further encumbered with a big, shapeless, and very unwieldy bundle, in a newspaper, tied by a cord. When the train paused at Newark, she rose, baby in arms, two other babies toddling after her, and tried to grasp her bundle, too.

"Madame, allow me to carry that bundle!" A young man, finely dressed, from boots to hat, with an unmistakable air of breeding, touched his hat, and picked up the big package. He also took the fat, dimpled hand of Baby Number Two, and simply, as if he had been assisting his mother, sister, or a friend of his family, escorted the burdened woman down the aisle, and helped her to the platform. She was too bewildered to thank him, as he lifted his hat again, and returning to his seat, resumed his paper. There was the gallantry of a real gentleman. That boy had been well brought up and showed it.

A STITCH IN TIME SAVES NINE

Here are four little people together,
Bobby, and Jean, and Tim,
And the darling sister Gertrude,
Who is always so neat and trim.
She is mending up Bobby the careless,
And Jeanie is helping along,
While the day is full of brightness,
And the hour as sweet as a song.
And she murmurs softly and clearly,
A word from a dear old rhyme,
How much is saved, in a family,
By taking a stitch in time.

Railway Accidents

EVERY season has its list of accidents on the road, and wintry weather, when fogs blur the air, rails are slippery, and the extreme cold dulls the vitality of engineers and motormen, is always distinguished by some terrible catastrophes. Few calamities seem so frightful as those which occur on short distance journeys, where men are going home from their daily work, or women setting out on errands of shopping or amusement. If we are starting on a trip around the globe, we take into our account the probability of disaster, but nobody expects sudden wounding or sudden death, when taking an ordinary journey of a few miles over a familiar route. When, as recently in Newark, a trolley car, crowded with children going to school in the morning, dashes down a steep grade into the very jaws of a racing express train, and beautiful girls of sixteen, and boys of the same bright age, are torn to pieces, the country holds its breath in horror. Maud, Viola, Rosebud, and the like, the pretty, dainty names of the fair young girls who were sacrificed in that holocaust, simply breaks one's heart. I cannot think of the scene without tears. Everywhere the snow, white and glittering, heaps of it, that came in the heavy storm when the drifts grew deep, and the north wind was an icy gale. And scattered about it, the children's note-books, and bags, and dinners, and garments, and the poor, maimed bodies all scarred and bruised; some living, some dead. Mothers sent those children forth with such light hearts; they had so little thought of peril; school was so safe a place, and who dreamed of death ready to spring on them from that grade-crossing, that every one had seen and passed over for years without accident.

Dear friends, when we send our loved ones out to business, or to school, or for any reason, let us do so with tender yearning and prayer. And when at night we lay our heads on the pillow, and the children are indoors and asleep, and all are well, let us thank God. And do not let us love him less, or lose our faith because these strange things happen, for, depend upon it, in the most mysterious, the most inexplicable dealings of Divine Providence, there is a Father's hand and "God's in his heaven. All's right with the world."

Deep in unfathomable mines
Of never-failing skill,
He treasures up his bright designs,
And works his sovereign will.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—SNOWFLAKE. The third finger of the left hand is for betrothal and wedding rings.

—CONSTANT READER. Adopt a short skirt for street wear. Long skirts must sweep up much dirt and many disease germs.

—ELLA B. Nothing would be so wrong as to marry a man for whom you have no love. Wait awhile and your parents may withdraw their opposition to the man you prefer.

—POSY. A thing may be in poor taste without being absolutely wrong. Engaged people should not kiss in the presence of others, because it is a parade of their situation and quite needless.

—A SUBSCRIBER. Choose your portieres of soft wool, rather than silk and wool, in a dull, shade of olive, or a dark crimson, according to the other furnishings and the wood-work of your house.

—NANNIE. A grown woman cannot wear as ornaments the gold medals she wore as a schoolgirl. She may keep them as heirlooms for her children or nieces. They would be valuable to the mission cause, only if sold for old gold, and would not bring their real worth.

—JEHU. I do not approve of long drives in the country, taken by young people alone. There should always be a party, and an older person in charge.

—INQUIRING FRIEND. Married men do not bear a label, so if one of them happen to attend a strange church without his wife, he might easily be asked by a single woman to sit in her pew. The act would have no significance, but the man should be occupied with the service, and not with his neighbor.

—INQUIRER. A son whose wife refuses to stay under the roof with his mother, and who must give his mother a home, is to be pitied. He is the cloth between the shears. The two women, who both love him, should settle their differences for his sake. As you state the case, the wife is in the wrong.

A SOJOURN IN A ZUNI PUEBLO

GATHERING THE CORN-STALKS

A ZUNI SHEPHERD AND HIS FLOCK

A ZUNI MOTHER AND HER HOME

SIMPLICITY is the key-note to all that applies to the Indian life, both to his habit of thought—religious or social—and his manner of action and work. Even his usages are rarely changed in spirit, however much so in externals. Yet a casual visitor, happening down there among the Zunis of New Mexico during the time of a dance, would come away with an impression of confusion, because of bewilderment caused by the actors, costumes, and intricate grouping of the various clans, in the performance of their "sacred rites," yet if he understood the symbolism of these acts, and how every detail was dependent from a central fact of the Zuni belief—"the earth-mother" —it would become apparent that all was based on the simplicity of fact—of the absolute unity of Zuni thought and faith in their gods.

The Zuni to-day number about 1,500 people, and in habit only a single large pueblo of adobe houses. This pueblo, however, is divided, not always clearly to the eye, but very clearly in the estimation of the people themselves, into seven parts, corresponding in sequence to their subdivisions of the "worlds" or world-quarters of this world. Thus, one division is related to the North, and to be centered in its kiva or estoufa, another the West, another the South, another the East, another the upper, and again the lower world, while a final division represents the middle or "mother," and synthetic combination of all in this world. This middle division symbolizes the central fact of Zuni organization. It has given a solidarity to the tribe, making the outlying pueblos subsidiary to the central one.

The Zuni remain, as regards their social and religious institutions and customs, and even their daily life, the most archaic of the Pueblo peoples. They still continue to be the most highly developed and representative of these people, uninfluenced by the white races. It is due more to this peculiar development than to any other that the Pueblos have remained distinctive, in some measure, of the time of the Spanish conquest of the Southwest, and that they have maintained so long, and so much more completely, their primitive characteristics.

They have successfully combatted the Catholic invasion. The history of their struggles, beginning with Don Vasquez de Coronado, to Diego de Vargas, is more or less familiar. The last Catholic attempt was in building the old church of Our Lady of Guadeloupe, in 1775. It now harbors only burros and shivering dogs of cold winter nights, and is toppling to ruin in the grand plaza of Zuni, never again to be reoccupied. "The church could not be rebuilt," say the Zunis. "It had been dead so long that, even if rehabilitated, it would be no longer familiar to the fathers, who, in spirit, had witnessed its decay. Nor can it be taken suddenly away. It had stood so long that, missing it, they would be sad, or might, perhaps, even abandon it." These people are slow to accept from an alien race any but material suggestions, and whatever they do adopt from others, has thus far neither distorted nor obscured the native religion nor the Zuni traditions.

To-day the Zuni tills his soil in the same primitive way his forefathers did. He does not reap his wheat, but gathers it as he gathers corn, in the ear. His sheep and goats are driven by day over the plains and mesas for feeding, and at night are housed near the town, or in distant shelters and corrals. The women, in the same primitive manner, weave their blankets on rudely constructed looms: their spinning wheel is simply a slender stick, to which is affixed a balance wheel, and they spin the wheel on their knees.

In pottery they excel, but no tools other than the hands are used: yet the beauty of the simple vases which they produce in these jars is remarkable.

The work of weaving blankets and baskets, and of making pottery, is performed by the women only, as well as the labor of keeping the house clean, and preparing food for the men.

The light side of life is always apparent in Zuni. They make work a sport, necessity a pleasure, and are ready in an instant to have a laugh or joke. The men sing while at work: the mother sings to her babe: the corn-grinders sing at their toil, and give variety to every occupation. To be sure, the dark side exists; but the Zunis are like children, and a smile lurks just behind every sorrow. Telling stories is one of the amusements of winter around the open fireside.

When the green corn comes, the Zunis live bountifully. Tall columns of smoke rise from the ovens at early morning, inviting to a feast of roast corn. Then there is feasting while the oars are hot, and jollity reigns in the pueblo.

There is a continual round of visiting from one friend's home to another. Away into the late hours they sit around the firesides, the men smoking, the women all gossip and smiles.

Their lives vary only as the seasons bring a change: but they are always apparently happy, contented in their simplicity. They do reverence to the heathen gods with solemnity and earnestness. To enlighten them with the Gospel is a task for missionary effort that is well worth the trying.

DR. PARKER'S SUCCESSOR

REV. REGINALD J. CAMPBELL ACCEPTS THE INVITATION TO THE PASTORATE OF THE LONDON CITY TEMPLE

NEWS comes by cable that the famous pulpit of the London City Temple, from which the late Dr. Joseph Parker addressed the most eminent men in the British metropolis, will be occupied by Rev. Reginald J. Campbell, M.A. This arrangement was foreseen at the time of Dr. Parker's death, and several prominent religious journals, before it was made, expressed the hope that it would be effected.

The choice of the church is all the more gratifying because Mr. Campbell was a most intimate friend of Dr. Parker, and enjoyed his confidence in a remarkable degree. He has also proved his fitness for the work, by his services during Dr. Parker's illness. One of the most important features of the City Temple's work is the Thursday noon service. To that service the statesmen, lawyers, bankers and merchants of the city have been going for many years. Mr. Gladstone and Lord Rosebery were frequently present, and other eminent men were seen in the congregation occasionally. The vast building was always filled to its utmost capacity, and this, too, on the busiest day of the week, and the busiest hour of the day. During Dr. Parker's last illness, Mr. Campbell preached, and there was the usual large and attentive audience.

Mr. Campbell is thirty-six years of age, and has been eight years in the ministry. His father and grandfather were both Congregational ministers. His university education was gained at Oxford, where he graduated with honors in modern history and political science. Hitherto he has been pastor of a Congregational church at Brighton, but he has been heard in most of the large cities of the country. He is described as thoroughly evangelical, and is a sturdy opponent of the political union of Church and State. In a recent address on public affairs, he took occasion to laud Oliver Cromwell as the greatest ruler England ever had—an utterance which, in present conditions, is very significant.

Some idea of the character of Mr. Campbell's preaching, as well as of his loyalty to the memory of the great preacher whom he succeeds, may be obtained from the following extract from the sermon he preached in the City Temple, on the Sunday after Dr. Parker's funeral:

REV. REGINALD J. CAMPBELL, M.A.

"Young men, I appeal to you, in the shadow of a great bereavement. Live only for the highest, 'tis the only thing worth while. Live for the Master, live for the things that are holy and true, for all that is high and noble and good shall live for evermore. All that was good in Dr Parker came by way of Jesus Christ, and as he said in the last sermon he ever delivered from this pulpit, Christ is not dead: no, he is alive for evermore, and always the same. Still is he calling across the field of time. Follow thou Me."

We are thankful to know that in a pulpit so prominent, the old doctrine of the Atonement will be clearly and definitely proclaimed. In a recent sermon, Mr. Campbell related the following incident: "I was summoned to the bedside of a lady who had been a great sinner, and was dying in great distress. 'Oh,' she sighed, 'that it were possible for some great, strong friend to take my conscience as though it were his own, that I might have a little peace!' I learned more from that sentence concerning the mystery of redemption than up to that moment I had ever thought of. Here was a soul who knew and stated the need of just such a salvation as we are bidden to proclaim. She asked, without knowing that there was any answer, for the Saviour who was made sin for us. The sense of guilt had awakened with power in this poor, dying woman. To have told her that the Most High could forgive her sins, would have carried no comfort to her heart. The only possible relief for her was to look at Him on whom the Lord hath laid the iniquity of us all. The reason why I venture to tell you this story is, because it is the best example within my knwledge of a soul knowing and stating its own need, without being aware that there was any hope of the satisfaction of that need."

WATCH AND REMEMBER

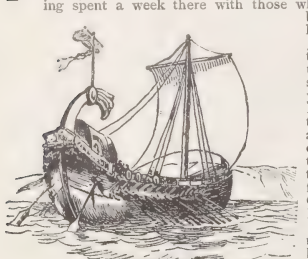
Paul's Farewell to Ephesus

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR APRIL 5
ACTS 20: 28-38

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT: "REMEMBER THE WORDS OF THE LORD JESUS, HOW HE SAID, IT IS MORE BLESSED TO GIVE THAN TO RECEIVE." ACTS 20: 35

PAUL is sailing into Miletus. It is Thursday, April 20, A. D. 58. Three days ago he took ship at Troas, having spent a week there with those who had been brought to love the Lord Jesus Christ through his teachings, seven or eight years before. He had come to Troas from a ten months' circuit among the churches that he had founded in Greece and Macedonia.



SHIP OF APOSTOLIC TIMES

Will anyone meet him as he lands at Miletus? Likely not; but he will lose no time in gathering people about him whom he can help, for the ship is to remain at Miletus three or four days shifting her cargo.

Paul lands at Miletus, and at once sends to Ephesus, thirty miles away, asking the elders of the church to come to him, explaining that he would go to them, but that his plans would not admit of a stay in Ephesus, as he must reach Jerusalem in season for the Feast of Pentecost in May. They are glad to come at his bidding, for they have not seen his face for a year, not since they had affectionately and reluctantly parted with him on the occasion of the great uproar brought about by the silversmiths. It was then that Paul had departed to undertake his tour among the churches he had established in Greece and Macedonia. They greet him with Chaise (rejoice), and this greeting is returned by Paul. They kiss him first on one cheek and then on the other, in Oriental style.

They note that Paul seems somewhat burdened in body, and he explains that he is bearing with him a considerable sum of money, donated by the churches in Greece and Macedonia, for the poor in the church at Jerusalem.

The hours are few and precious, and how shall they be spent? Above all things, they from Ephesus would hear Paul speak again. He briefly recalls his dwelling among them for three years, and how he had, in synagogues and public places, proclaimed the Gospel of Christ alike to Jew and Greek, and how he had gone from house to house teaching "in His Name." He tells them of his prospective journey to Jerusalem, that he knows afflictions await him, because the Holy Spirit had so prophesied to him. "But," he adds, "none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the Gospel of the grace of God." Paul goes on to say that they will probably never see him again, and that he hopes they will remember him as one who was faithful to his duty at all times. And then he proceeds to talk to them about the duties which lay before them as elders in the Church of God. He tells them that they have been made shepherds of the Church by the Holy Spirit. He tries to impress upon them the sacredness of their charge, as souls having been purchased with the precious blood of Jesus. He warns them of dangers in the Church from those who will call themselves "teachers," but who will lead some of the people into wrong-doing. Those Paul calls "grievous wolves" destroying the flock, the Church of God. He says to them, "When those evil days come, remember my prayers and my tears." And he takes out his Bible roll from the folds of his cloak, and urges them to read for themselves and for others, God's own words about how they should live, and act, and speak. He beseeches them to be kind to the poor and the weak, remembering the words of the Lord Jesus how he said: "It is more blessed to give than to receive." He finally kneels upon the sand, and prays with them that all grace may be given to them.

The sails are being hoisted, commands are being given to start the ship. Loving friends bow their heads on Paul's shoulders and weep as they kiss him good-by, sorrowing most of all for the words which he spake, that they should see his face no more. And they accompany him to the ship, which is soon in motion, and the bank of oars on either side rise and fall in unison. The ship is headed toward the small island of Coos, forty miles away, where the next stop is to be made. But there will be no friends to greet Paul. He will not see a friendly face until he comes to Tyre, seven days hence, where he will spend a day with mutual friends of Christ. On the day following his visit to Tyre, he is to spend many days in Cesarea, in the house of Philip, who is himself a teacher and preacher, and has four daughters who are Christian teachers. At Cesarea he is to meet friends who will try to dissuade him from going on to Jerusalem, and he is to be shown by a man named Agabus, lately come from Jerusalem, that he will surely be bound and thrown into prison when he gets there. But Paul will answer again: "None of these things move me," and he will pursue his way on to Jerusalem.

Illustration and Application

The key words of this lesson are, "Watch and Remember." Watch your words, watch your deeds, for memory will make both immortal, for pleasure or pain in recollection, in this world and the next. Let your words, like those of the Lord Jesus, recalled in the Golden Text, be so unselfish that you and others will be glad to remember them. Let your deeds, too, be as unselfish as those that Paul recalled in his own life without regret. Eternal reward and eternal punishment inhere in the wonderful power of memory, which keeps a book of life where every word and deed and thought is indelibly written. If the very fear of death will swiftly turn the prayer of this book, as it often does, to bring to view wrongs we have done that we had long forgotten, much more will God's stern call, "Remember" (Luke 16: 25) open every page, unless forgiveness sought through the Crucified, who puts the past under the blood, has given memory the song, "Unto him that hath washed us from our sins in his own blood" (Rev. 1: 5).

Take heed unto yourselves and to all the flock.—Beginning in the Pentateuch, the Church of God is tenderly pictured all through the Bible as a flock, of which God is the loving Shepherd, whose under shepherds are pastors—the very word means shepherds—and other church officers. A group of elders from the little church at Ephesus are here charged by Paul to "take heed to themselves and to all the flock." It is but an application of the second great commandment, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," which calls for egoism (not egotism) as well as altruism. A man who would do most for others must first of all take heed to himself, physically, mentally, morally, spiritually. The best development of self includes self-denial, self-sacrifice, self-forgetfulness. Though most of us are too selfish, we instinctively praise as nobler every act of unselfishness, especially when it rises to self-sacrifice and self-forgetfulness. Even a bird won honor in the case of a carrier pigeon, which was shot by some sportsman as it bore its message, but it kept right on till the precious letter was delivered to its master, shortly after which the wounded bird laid down and died. Surely we who bear an invitation from Christ for sinful, endangered men, will not let some slight ailment keep us from Sunday School or prayer meeting or personal work.

Happy if with our latest breath
We may but speak His Name.

The faithful shepherd often risks his life in battles with robbers and beasts to save his sheep; much more should they who are shepherds of human souls forget selfish interests to save them now and forever. When a ship's captain, in some disaster, forgets his own peril and his own interest in efforts to save his passengers and crew, we crown him with admiration. Such a case was recorded in connection with the destruction of Martinique by the eruption of Mount Pelee. The Roddam had just anchored in the harbor when the fiery shower fell upon her, destroying instantly any who had not swiftly hurried below, and even in the cabin the penetrating ashes blistered the hands and face of Captain Freeman and others. After a few moments, however, the plucky captain mounted the bridge, and signaled to the engine-room, "full speed, astern," and they escaped "as by fire." All the beautiful paint was scorched off the vessel, and its deck and crew were covered with gray ashes. As they entered the next harbor, St. Lucia, their own port, the captain said to the ship's agents who came on board: "You do not know me?" "Yes, by your voice, not your looks," they answered. "You have come through an awful time." "Aye," said the captain, "from hell's gate; but look to the others, I'm all right." In the presence of such unselfishness, how mean seems the average commercialism that cries, "Every man for himself and the devil take the hindmost." Why should we not do business put the interests of "all" above the selfishness of the one, as is so often done in war, and fire, and in home life, and in supreme moments, when the best in us asserts itself?

Feed the Church of God.—This word to the elders of every age can mean no less than Sunday School teaching by them—their best opportunity to "feed the Church of God." It is a wonder that so many church officers can stay at home from the teaching hour and leave classes unshepherded or inadequately shepherded. "Lovest thou me? Feed my lambs. Feed my sheep." The story is told of a nobleman who, when he went forth to walk over his estates, carried acorns to plant where a spot seemed bare and dreary. Thus went he, planting the seeds of Christian life and of Christian nation, wherever he found opportunity. And the same spirit in us will incline us to use our opportunities to plant the Christian life especially in young hearts. And even the young may find open fields to plant among their fellows.

Purchased with his own blood.—How precious the church and even a single soul, purchased with such a price! And how great the privilege to save anything so costly from waste and loss!

Under an eastern sky, amid a rabble cry,
A man went forth to die—For me!
Thorn-crowned his blessed head, blood-stained his weary tread,
Cross-laden he was led—For me!
Pierced were his hands and feet, three hours o'er him beat
Fierce rays of noontide heat—For me!
Thus wert thou made all mine; Lord, make me wholly thine
Grant grace and strength divine—To me!
In thought and word and deed thy will to do, O lead
My soul, e'en though it bleed—To thee!

Therefore watch and remember.—Why should we stumble in faith, and fear Christianity itself, because there is false or falling because hypocrites appear in the Church, men who wear religion only as a cloak, who dishonor it by what they do in business, in politics, in the home, and even in the Church itself, where they are wolves in sheep's clothing? Such hypocrites have been in the Church from the days of Cain, and Achan, and Judas, and Demas; and the parables of the tares and the net assure us they will be, until the final separation of good and evil. But our anxiety be only that we be not of those whose religion is only an outward form and farce. "Lord, is it I?" "Watch and remember" is the charge that we watch against those who even in the name of religion say harmful things, and "remember" instead the sure word of inspiration, such as Paul himself spoke, and he recalls. A reckless youth named Davoine, a French Catholic creole of Mauritius, walking on the seashore picked up something that had drifted in from a wreck. It was a well-bound book, which a friend told him was the Bible, a book he had been made to feel that only priests should read. But it had come to him in such a strange way that he resolved to read it. It led him to become an earnest Christian, and to bring his friends to the flock of the Good Shepherd. So a shipwrecked Bible had saved a human soul from wreck. Surely the words of men, even of good men in the Church, should be allowed to displace, or even dishonor the divine words God has sent us through Christ, and especially through the Book, whose history proves it a superhuman Book, since it has transformed many

The Word of his grace, which is able to build you up.—There is a strange plant called nardoo, which grows in the deserts of Australia, a fern-like plant, with seeds that the natives eat when they can get no other food. For the moment it seems to satisfy hunger, and produces a pleasant feeling, but it does not nourish, does not "build up" the body. A party of explorers, crossing this centre desert, found themselves without food. "Here," said King, the leader, "is a plant which the natives eat, I know. We need not fear starvation." Day after day they fed on the nardoo. At first they felt satisfied. Presently their strength began to fail. "I feel weak as a baby," said one. "I am sure I cannot walk more than a mile to-day," affirmed another. Their flesh wasted from their bones, and, unable to proceed further, they lay down and died of starvation. A solitary survivor was discovered under a tree. He told the story of their journey and expired. All substitutes for the Bible are nardoo seed.

Remember the words of the Lord Jesus how he said, It is more blessed to give than to receive.—Mr. John R. Mott visited a college in Ceylon, where he found a band of students in poor that sixteen of them occupied one room. Near the building was a garden in which they spent their spare time cultivating bananas. When he inquired, "What do you do with the money?" they took him to the shore and pointed to an island off in the sea. "Two years ago," they said, "we sent one of our graduates there. He started a school, and it has developed into a church. We are going to send him another island this year." Their cook laid aside every ten handful of rice, that they might sell it in order to have Christ preached more widely. Among the richest joys of earth and heaven are the memories of such unselfish words and deeds

CHILDREN, a good many little folks have asked, "More pictures and fewer questions," and so we give you this week four picture puzzles and no "Curious Questions." It may be that quite a number will plead for "Curious Questions" to be restored, so we do not engage not to have them again.

There is, therefore, but one competition this week. The answer best of all wins a watch; the answer next in excellence, our Smith-Peloubet Bible Dictionary; the third, Long's Beasts of the Field, a handsome, illustrated book about animals, and the fourth, Bailey's Our Own Birds, a delightful, illustrated book, telling all about American birds. For answers that are strikingly meritorious, but that do not reach the standard of these, the same rule will be observed as heretofore—the letters from each State, territory or province being judged by themselves—and a beautiful book awarded to the best from each.

Answers to Competition of Feb. 25

and Names of Prize-Winners

Answers to Picture Puzzles of Feb. 14 are: 1. Gerard. 2. Enoch. 3. Cotton was a cloth but its bulk, worth twice its weight in silver. 4. Enoch "walked with God," for was translated. These are the most important facts about the subjects of the two picture puzzles. For Curious Questions: 1. Jacob. Isaac. II. Kings 11: 2, 3. 2. At the laying of the foundation of the second Temple, when the people shouted for joy, "and cast lots" when remembered the greater magnificence of the first Temple wept, and the "noise of the shout of joy from the noise of the weeping" cannot hardly be discerned. Ezra 3: 11-13. 3. Crack

COMPETITION 31

What three proper names mentioned in Scripture do the three first of these pictures represent? What name not mentioned in Scripture does the fourth picture represent? And under what name is its possessor referred to in the New Testament?

Write "Competition 31" plainly across the top of a postal card or sheet of paper, next, your name, age and address; then the answers. For each of the three first answers employ but one word—the proper name which you think the pictures represent. For the fourth, two words—the name the picture stands for and the Scriptural name of its possessor. Don't quote Scripture passages; simply state the names. Below the answer, write, in not over twenty words, what, in your judgment, are the most important facts concerning the subject of the first of these pictures? Read the rules given below.

RULES AND PRIZES

Contests are not open to competitors over fourteen years of age. Do not send two solutions. There is no objection to asking the help of others, but each competitor must send in the answers in his or her own handwriting. Should you use paper instead of a postal card, be sure to write on the envelope in which you enclose your answer "Competition 31." Do not write on both sides of a sheet of paper.

All answers must be mailed not later than March 30, 1903. Address, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Little Folks' Department, Bible House, New York.

Prizes—For the best answer to Competition 31, a handsome silver watch, lady's or gentleman's. For the second best answer, our Smith-Peloubet Bible Dictionary; the third, Long's Beasts of the Field a handsome, entertaining, and instructive book about animals; the fourth, Bailey's Our Own Birds, a delightful illustrated book about American birds. For the next best answer from each State, territory and Canadian province sending meritorious responses to competitions, a beautiful book as consolation prize.

For the best answer to "Picture Puzzles" of Feb. 25th, Ora McFall, Pickens, S. Car., receives a silver watch; for the best answer to "Curious Questions" of same date, Eva S. Moore, Kansas City, Mo., receives a silver watch. Each of the following receives a book:

Kate Brook's Protégée

By MARY LOWE DICKINSON

KATHERINE BROOKS belonged to the Win One Chapter. She had worn her little silver cross a whole year before she had heard of this branch of the Order's work. She was young, and so brave and bright that everybody thought her pretty. She was out of school now, and the circle to which she had belonged in the seminary days was scattered. It had been a very lovely tie that bound them, and the little meetings in the upper room of the class building had been very sweet, and the girls had tried more or less earnestly to do the school work In His Name. The teachers would have said the Order's influence in the school was good. There was more courtesy, less slang, less snubbing of the poorer, and more helpfulness toward the duller girls. Of course, it must have meant that there was more sweetness and patience and tenderness on the inside, or these outward signs must have failed, for the spring is no sweeter than its source.

Be that as it might, for good or evil, that life was over now. Kate was "in society," but somehow there had dropped out of its daily round of pleasant occasions the music of His Name. She went faithfully to church—it had been the habit of the family life. She laughed and sang and chatted and flirted through days that were crowded with social pleasures.

She wore her little cross when she did not forget it, or was not too hurried in dressing to remember it, and she still said her prayers—rather sleepy ones, sometimes, before she closed her eyes at night. Everything looked well, and certainly everything would have been well but for an undercurrent of unrest and dissatisfaction beneath all the sparkling surface of her life.

It was Lent, but Lent is not a very sombre time in New York, and the service every day did not shut out the gayety of every night. There was a good deal to enjoy, and Katherine enjoyed it to the full until the angel sent of God stirred to their depths the waters of her life.

It was a breezy March evening, and Cousin Tom had promised to take her to the concert. It was Lent, but then it was early, and, by and by, she meant to be very strict indeed. Besides, she was not often in New York, and Tom was so busy with his clubs and things that he was not always available as an escort, and since Tom was a little inclined to be wild, it was only right that she should please him, lest she should lose all influence over him.

All this went through her mind as she adjusted her hat and drew on her gloves. As she gathered up the lace at her throat, and took up the little pin which she usually wore there, her eye caught the flash of its pendant, her little silver cross. For an instant she hesitated, then with an impatient gesture she quickly detached it, and dropped it into the little jewel box. "It isn't a bit of use to try to wear it always! It isn't suitable, anyway, when one is dressed; it should be of pearls, or something less conspicuous, and plain. Besides, Tom hates it. He thinks it only a fad, and I know he wouldn't like to see it tonight," and she ran down to him as fresh and lovely a creature as one could wish to see.

They reached the concert hall.

"What's this?" said Tom, observing that as large a throng seemed to be moving away from the place as was moving toward it. "What is the matter?"

"No concert to-night. Leading singer fell down in a faint. They have found out that she is dead. Heart gave out all in a minute," said another, "and there was no one to take her place."

The crowd increased, and before Tom could force his way out, an ambulance rolled slowly away from the side entrance, and Kate shuddered at the outline of a human form that filled her vision for a moment as it passed.

"Never mind, Coz," said Tom, cheerily. "Let's try another place. We can't have such ghastly luck again. It's very inconsiderate of the woman to choose just the night to make her exit when we wanted to be amused."

"Hush, Tom! How can you joke in sight and sound of such a dreadful thing!"

"I'm not joking; I am only trying to keep my pretty cousin from hysterics over a person not worth a thought."

"She was a woman, Tom."

"Yes, but what a woman! Her pretty daughter is on the stage, and I heard Dick Elwood say she was coming on the same way. She was to sing to-night. I wish you had seen her; she looks a little bit like you. But where shall we go, Kate?"

"Nowhere, Tom, thank you. I really don't feel like being amused any more."

They were passing the entrance to a hall. A light streamed out on the pavement, a chorus of many voices, some manly and loud, some womanly, but not very sweet, was singing heartily. The words broke strangely upon Kate's ear, as if from another world—quite unlike this thronged and lighted street. She paused involuntarily.

Rescue the perishing, care for the dying,
Snatch them in pity from sin and the grave.

"It's the Rescue Mission. Want to go in?"

"No." But as they passed on the words rang after her:

Care for the erring ones, tenderly lead them,
Jesus is merciful, Jesus will save.

"Yes, Tom, let us go in. I—I want to see what it is like."

And it was like nothing she had ever seen or heard. There were men and women, too, with sin-scarred faces and work-grimed hands speaking with tears of the power to save that was holding them back from the pit. There were young men, even lads, bloated and bleareyed. There were women and girls, too, whose faces wore the mark of many an evil day; and some of these prayed and praised and pleaded for and with others, coming tremblingly and half blindly to One who was mighty to save.

There were ladies there, gentle of face and voice, and a Great-Heart of a leader, who, having been saved from drink and sin himself, seemed to have but one thought, and that, how to rescue the perishing. And he talked in the simplest way of the Win One Chapter, of the Order to which Kate belonged. The little cross was on his watch-chain.

"It is one of the sweetest privileges Christ gives us," he said, "that of sharing his blessed work. His heart is loving, bent on saving, and he divides up the precious wanderers, as it were, and says to you and to me: 'Find one. Bring one home to my fold and to me, the Shepherd. Each of you who love me, prove it by seeking and loving and bringing one back to my heart.' There is only one way to win them. Only one road by which they will come. Go into their wilderness after them, and be to them what Christ was to the friend beloved. They may come up out of the wilderness then, leaning on your arm and your heart, and so find their way even into his heart which yearns over them, waits for them—waits for us to bring them one by one."

The words were very simple. Kate knew it all before, but this touched her strangely. As she listened, her eyes softened with tears, her heart with prayers that seemed to fill it for these, the sinning, the weak, for whom her Master cared enough to die. If He could die, surely she might live to help Him in saving them. Perhaps she could win one.

And suddenly there rose before her vision a face that Tom had said was a little like her own, the face of the motherless girl who was going, as he said, the same way the mother went. Perhaps—perhaps—who knew? He, the Christ who loved her would let her help win this one, this one, already wandering "Away on the mountains wild and bare, away from the tender Shepherd's care." Her mother was dead, poor child. Perhaps there was no one to care very much. Perhaps God would show her how to let the poor girl know she cared. It is too long a story to tell the wondrous way he showed her how.

She could not go to seek the child of the dead singer, but she told her story to a woman who could, and they came together in that woman's home, the fair "society girl" and the motherless young actress, whose face, as it looked out from the black veil, was sad and as sweet as Katherine's own.

"This is the young friend who was at the concert the night your mother died, and whose heart has been so touched by your sorrow that she wants to know you better," said the woman friend, who was wise enough then to go away and leave the two girls alone.

And they became friends, meeting again and again. Sometimes they sat in some dim church at the vesper service, that was at first only a soothing hour in a peaceful spot, whose chief charm to the orphan girl was that she could be there by Katherine's side.

But Katherine's earnest-hearted prayers, accompanied as they were with the marks, not of missionary condescension, but of friendliness, real and strong, could not fail to be felt. And by and by the dim church became the place where two prayed, and where two hearts united in the purpose to go forth and help the Master bring another and another home to the heart of God.

When Easter morning came and Katherine was ready, radiant as any bright blossom of spring, and cousin Tom waited with his hat to go to church with her, she said:

"Excuse me, Tom, but I want to go with Agnes; it is her first communion, you know."

Is it not probable that he will ose sight of me in the mass?

is not probable, and it would be very unand unwise for you to act on such a supion. We have no means of estimating relative importance of our world to the erse. A learned astronomer, Dr. Alfred Vallace, has published recently an argut that our world occupies a central and ue position in space. That theory is otful, but we have no means of knowing ther other worlds are inhabited, or by order of beings. It may be that man being of far greater importance than we estimate. Ir. Garrett P. Serviss, the well-known onomical authority, furnishes this answer]: t was formerly thought that a planet exd between Mercury and the sun, and it named 'Vulcan.' But all attempts to dier the supposed planet have resulted in ure, and the few instances in which observ- have reported seeing a suspicious object, ch might have been Vulcan, are now dislited as evidence of its existence. The ent opinion of astronomers is that there o such planet, but that there may possibly a ring of small, and separately invisible, ies revolving around the sun, inside the it of Mercury, which produce the irregucies in the motion of Mercury that were origin of the Vulcan hypothesis."

. C., New Haven, Conn. Paul taught in his sermon to the Athenians that God was the Father of the whole race. Is that a different relation from that which he occupies toward the Christian?

es, the latter is much closer. You may the difference in families. A good ner may have a son so wicked as to dise the name he bears. He may be a liar, a rtine, a thief, while his father is all that is ight and honorable. The son is a son still ugh he is disobedient and undutiful. If he ents and reforms, his father would gladly come him, not as a stranger but as a son. son who has his father's spirit, who is his father, is nearer to him. Physically relationship is the same, but the good son spiritually as well as physically his son. So with God. We are his children even in our unconverted state, but unworthy children Only when we come to him and are born again of the Spirit are we in very deed his children in the highest sense.

Additional answers to our Marriage Question (of February 25) have been received from Rev. C. P. Atkinson, Dayton, Ala.; Wesley N. Peck, Alice C. Boynton, Fruitvale, Cal.; O. E. Worcester, Marie Broadhurst, Brooklyn, N. Y.; M. J. Fleming, Greenwood, Ind.; Mrs. J. M. G., Bonaparte, Ia.; M. K. D. D., Mrs. Sue G. B., Matawan, W. Va., and H. H., Leonia, N. Y. These were too late to be included in the symposium which appeared in last week's issue.

J. L. S., Union City, Pa., writes:

In the Mail-Bag, February 18, there is a question of how a church bell should be rung. Having had several years of experience as sexton, which duty included the ringing of the bell, and from observation, I would give my opinion. In the first place, many bell ropes are so adjusted to the wheel that no less than two strokes can be given before a rest, which makes the sounds of the bell monotonous. If the bell-rope is properly adjusted, any number of strokes can be given between pauses, and by these variations we get rid of this sameness. As to the length of time between pauses, I should judge from twelve to fifteen seconds a reasonable time.

Subscriber, Brooklyn, N. Y. The church of which I am a member has decided to raise funds for an object of which I disapprove. I hate to stand aloof from any effort my church is making. What ought I to do?

Much depends on the ground of your objection. If the object is wrong, if it involves a surrender of principle, then you ought not to contribute. If it is merely that you think it is unnecessary, or that the church is under no obligation to give, you may rightly waive your objection and be loyal to the decision of the church.

D. B. S., writes:

I noticed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of February 25, a question by Mrs. J. W. W., in regard to the organization and design of the first Sunday School. I found the following in an old scrapbook: "In 1668, a school for Sunday instruction was attempted in Holland. In 1698, the elders of the church in Roxbury, Mass., were ordered to instruct the children in the tenets of religion on Sunday afternoons. In 1750, Ludwig Thatcher opened such a school in Pennsylvania. Robert Raikes began in Gloucester, England, in 1784, with four salaried teachers: Wesley seized upon the idea, and gathered in one year eight hundred pupils and eighty teachers."

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Pitman Shorthand Course seems to have given universal satisfaction. A very large percentage of the students have sent to Mr. Pitman excellent specimens of their work. The pupils include young, middle-aged, and even old people. One lady of seventy (Mrs. C. Crane) writes that she followed all the lessons, finding them systematic and explicit. Her own specimen of shorthand work is excellent, and shows what can be accomplished even at such an age.

FOOLED THE HOSPITAL.

Was Pronounced Incurable, But Got Well on Pure Food.

Sometimes in a case of disease resulting from the use of improper food, the symptoms are so complex that medical science cannot find the seat of trouble, and even the most careful hospital treatment fails to benefit. A gentleman of Lee, Mass., says: "On April 1, 1900, I was sent home by one of our Massachusetts hospitals, saying nothing more could be done for me. I have been a great sufferer from nervous diseases and rheumatism and nervous prostration, and had previously been treated at Sharon Springs and by a number of doctors without getting much assistance.

"One day I was feeling worse than usual when I read an article about your Grape-Nuts that impressed me so that I sent out for a package. I commenced using it at breakfast the next day.

"For fifteen months I never missed one day. If you ever saw anyone grow strong and improve it was I. I gained from 125 to my old weight, 165. I will always be a cripple from rheumatism, but otherwise I am so much improved that I now feel as well as any man in this country." Name furnished by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There is a receipt book in each package of Grape-Nuts that will interest the housekeeper.

There are many commendable hair preparations but none of them seem to possess the vital principles which have made the Satin Softened Sisters "Scalp Cleaner and Hair Grower" so famous. The Scalp Cleaner makes an ideal shampoo. It produces a rich, creamy lather, which thoroughly cleanses the hair and removes every particle of scurf and dandruff. It is unsurpassed for cleansing and far superior to any green soap, wash or shampoo.

The Hair Grower will positively grow hair where the least particle of life exists in the dying hair root. Its rapid life giving qualities are guaranteed. It is refreshing, soothing, and makes and keeps the hair as soft as silk. For two decades these preparations have been making strong, steadfast friends. Today they are sold by dealers in the U. S. and are sailing their way with steadily increasing success to many thousands of homes in other countries. Ask your dealer about it or address Satin Softened Sisters, 18 Desbrosses Street, New York City.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Earnest Inquirer, Harpersville, N. Y. 1. Who is Thomas a Kempis? 2. In his Imitation of Christ, the word "Jesu" occurs. Is it identical with "Jesus?"

1. He was Thomas Hamerken, born in Kempen, in Prussia, 1379. He became an Augustinian monk, and lived a long life of study and seclusion, dying about 1471. He was a man of great sanctity and learning, and wrote many sermons, treatises, biographies, letters and hymns, his principal work being the Imitation, which has been read all over the civilized world, and translated into many languages. 2. The words are identical.

A. M. H., Brighton, Mich. We never heard of it.

H. M. K., Morganfield, Ky. Write to Garrett Serviss, 8 Middagh street, Brooklyn, N. Y., for information.

G. F. W., Washington, D.C. We have no other estimates on the subject than those that can be found in almanacs for the current year.

Francis G. McN., Shannon, Ill. 1. We note, with approval, your comments on the durbar. 2. Yes, Ederseim was a Jew, who had become a convert to Christianity.

Mother, Paterson, N. J. You can procure the book of "Prayers for Public Worship, Private Devotion and Personal Ministry," from Miss Munson, publisher, 77 Bible House, New York. Price $1. It is just what you want.

J. J. N., Larned, Kan. There are doubtless many sincere people who hold the belief to which you refer, but it is also unfortunately true that it has been degraded to the level of a money-making business. Our advice would be to leave it alone.

Susan M. S., Mansfield, O. Practice and profession should go hand-in-hand together. This should be specially the case with those who are in the forefront of Christian work. They should avoid even the appearance of evil.

Z. T. H., Cookeville, Tenn. Spiritualism, so-called, is largely practised by charlatans and humbugs, and your friend has probably been deceived by such people. Professional spiritualism has been thoroughly exposed.

N. N. P., Mount Carmel, Conn. Stockjobbing is a speculative "time bargain," in which there is no actual transference of shares, but simply a payment of the difference by the buyer or seller, according to the fluctuation in the price of the stock at the time, above or below the price named in the bargain. It is simply gambling.

An Aged Christian Honored

"AUNT LIZZIE" AIKEN, of Chicago, Ill., will this week be the recipient of a notable testimonial. She is eighty-six years old on March 24. "Aunt Lizzie" has been one of the truest soldiers of the Cross, and during her lifetime has done a noble work for the Master she loves so well. She was a nurse on the battle-field during the four years of the Civil War, and, shortly after the war she came to Chicago, and incidentally found her way to the Second Baptist Church, where she was shortly after employed as its Sunday School visitor and church missionary, a position she has efficiently filled ever since. Now that she cannot go to the people as she used to do, they come to her, and in the quiet of her own room there is meditation and prayer for all. She has a large number of callers daily, with the exception of Sunday, when they are excluded, as it is reserved as a day of rest for her, outside of the regular church services. The last years of her life are very much like those of Paul. She is loved by old and young, grown people and children of all ages, and her friends are legion. "Aunt Lizzie" is a constant reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. She says: "I don't only read it myself, but I loan it to others to read. I like to pass the good news along."

PAUL'S FAREWELL

Affectionate Injunctions and Warnings to the Leaders

By Mrs. M. Baxter

IN all his journeys, Paul was about his Master's business. At Troas he tarried some days. The words, "We sailed away from Philippi," show that Luke was again his companion, and some other brethren were of the company—Sopater, Aristarchus and Secundus, Gaius and Timothy, Tychicus and Trophimus. But these seven had preceded Paul, and waited for him and Luke at Troas.

The first day of the week, the Sunday, a farewell meeting took place. Paul's heart was very full, and he spoke on until midnight, for he had much to say under the consciousness that it was his last visit to Troas. There were many lights in the upper chamber, the air was close, and a young man, Eutychus, sat in a window, and, being overcome with sleep, fell from the third story, and was taken up dead. Paul was the messenger of life; he went down and fell on him, and, embracing him, said, "Make ye no ado, for his life is in him." And then, after a last Lord's Supper, and a very late evening meal, this energetic man talked with his beloved disciples until daybreak, and departed. But he left behind him the resuscitated Eutychus—a living proof of the power of the Word, which he preached as a life-word for spirit, soul and body. After this, Paul, needing, no doubt, time alone with God, went south by land, leaving his companions to journey by ship. He avoided Ephesus, for he was "hastening, if it were possible for him, to be at Jerusalem the Day of Pentecost." Paul had "purposed in the spirit" to go to Jerusalem (Acts 19:2).

From Miletus Paul went to Ephesus, "and called to him the elders of the church." In this journey he seems to have had a kind of presentiment that it was his last visit to Asia; but II. Tim. 4:13-20 shows that between his two imprisonments at Rome he must have visited Troas and Miletus once again. When the elders came to him, he said unto them, "Ye know now from the first time that I set foot in Asia, after what manner I was with you all the time, serving the Lord with all humility of mind, and with many tears, and with trials which befell me of the plots of the Jews" (Acts 20:17-19, R. V.). How different this from the way in which Christian workers often speak of their labors, their difficulties, and their success—what they have been able to achieve, etc. Paul's word to his elders spoke first of him whom he served, and how he served him. "Serving the Lord." He was no man's servant, and he depended on no man for his salary, but worked with his own hands for his maintenance, and thus he was free from all men, accountable to none but God.

He served the Lord "with all lowliness of mind, and with many tears." His lowliness of mind was unto the Lord; his tears, too. It was not in the first place with the object of winning more souls, although the result would surely be that, but his tears were part of his service to God, and his persecution by the Jews also he speaks of as part of the same service. These things were not personal between him and the Jews; to endure them was a part of his vocation. It was in the midst of these persecutions that Paul served the Lord in his ministry to the Ephesians. "I shrank not," he says, "from declaring unto you, anything that was profitable, and teaching you publicly, and from house to house, testifying both to Jews and Greeks, repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ." His teaching and testifying were all part of his service to God.

Paul's teaching was "repentance toward God," as an absolute necessity for "faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ." Whether Bible-reading Jews or idol-worshiping Gentiles, each man must recognize his responsibility to the one true God, and know himself a condemned sinner in his sight, that he might know for what he had to trust a Saviour. The preaching of faith, before men are conscious of their sin, leads to mental or sentimental faith, and certain backsliding. Paul did not try to force men either to repent or to believe, but he served the Lord in preaching what is due from creatures to the God who made them.

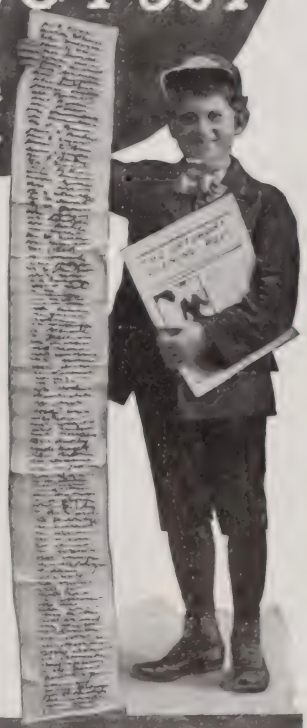
YOU can do the same.



HE IS the "Champion Boy" of the State of Washington. His name is Harry Ireland. The smile on his face is due to the fact that he had in his pocket a check for $25 from The Saturday Evening Post.

THIS $25 is in addition to the regular commission he receives week after week for selling The Post.

HARRY is a hustler. The long strip of paper he holds in his hand is covered with closely-written signatures of people who have instructed him to deliver The Post for four consecutive weeks.

HE persuaded several prominent business men to sign at the top of the sheet and their names influenced others to sign until the list became longer than he is tall.

THIS is one of the many ways we have suggested to help boys to sell The Post. It makes the work so easy that thousands of boys have taken it up. Some are making $10 to $15 a week after school hours.

YOU can start in this business, at once, without capital. Send us your name and we will forward 10 free copies, which you can sell at five cents each. This will supply capital for the next week's order.

The Good Samaritan*

An Exhibition of Kindliness of Spirit Characteristic of the Christian

SPECIAL significance attaches to the Parable of the Good Samaritan, because more than any other, it breathes the spirit of Christianity. There is little doubt that both the Priest and the Levite were strict observers of the law. They would have gone to the assistance of the robbed and wounded man, if there had been in the law a specific command requiring them to help such a man in such circumstances. Herein is the difference between Judaism and Christianity. The New Testament contains few specific injunctions; it expects a man who is under the influence of Christ, to be in a state in which specific injunctions are not needed. If his heart is right, if he has the spirit of Christ, he may be trusted to do the right thing without an order. In becoming a Christian, a man's disposition is changed. Touch him, at what point you will, you bring a Christian response. In Christ's picture of the last judgment (Matt. 25: 31-46), the people on his right were surprised at being commended and rewarded. They could not remember doing such things as he mentioned. They had been done so naturally and spontaneously, that no expectation of reward had been cherished. The Good Samaritan, whom Christ sketches, was a neighborly man, a helpful man. The question which elicited the Parable, was one of discrimination: "Who is my neighbor?" Christ turned the question away from the object to the subject. He asked, in effect: "Have you the neighborly spirit?" If a man has the neighborly spirit, he will not wait to scrutinize too closely the object. He wants to help, and if another needs help, it is given. This does not mean that every request for money is to be granted, that every beggar on the street is to be relieved. The need of the suppliant may be for something different from money. In fact, it often happens, that a gift of money may do more harm than good. Perhaps, giving a little time, making a little effort, or a little sacrifice, would be of more avail than giving money. The point is to give the man the kind of help he needs. As the Samaritan gave up his steed, risked his own safety, and provided for the unfortunate's future welfare—in fact, adapted the help to the need, so true charity is intelligent kindliness applied unselfishly.

INDIFFERENCE†

A Grave Danger Against Which Every Christian Should Be On His Guard

ONE of the significant incidents related by a well-known adviser of young people is that of a French professor, who, hearing that a friend was about to settle in a certain district, advised him not to do so. Asked for his reason, he replied: "The boys who come to our industrial branch from that district do not strike hard on the anvil." He believed that no country could be prosperous in which the people were not earnest and energetic. Success in any occupation depends upon those qualities. Whether it be mental or manual, its prizes go to the earnest worker. It is so in religion. "Strive to enter in"; "So run that ye may obtain"; "Be diligent that ye be found of him"; "I press toward the mark"—these and a host of other passages all show that earnestness is required in religion as in other pursuits. The Laodicean Church had a withering condemnation (Rev. 3: 16), not because of its great wickedness, but because it was disgustingly indifferent. It had not energy enough even to be bad. The prize that God sets before the Christian is grand enough to arouse his enthusiasm. There is nothing in life to compare with it. No man ought to call himself a Christian who does not appreciate it so highly that he is striving earnestly to gain it and is prepared to sacrifice everything that hinders him in the struggle. Yet indifference, especially in nominally Christian lands, is fearfully common. In lands where there is persecution the soul is toned for the conflict; but where there is no opposition there is often indifference. This is the great danger young Christians in our day need to avoid.

ARTISTIC MONUMENTS

DUE respect for our departed loved ones demands that we erect Artistic and Enduring Memorials. Marble has proved an unfortunate failure. Moss-grown, broken and tumbled-down slabs appear everywhere. Some cemeteries now prohibit marble entirely. Granite, too, soon gets discolored, moss-grown, cracks, crumbles and decays. Besides, it is very expensive.

WHITE BRONZE Monuments are Cheaper and Infinitely BETTER.

They are strictly everlasting. Rust, corrosion and moss-growth are IMPOSSIBILITIES. They CANNOT crumble from the action of frost. WHITE BRONZE is far more artistic and expressive than any stone. Then why not investigate it? It has been on the market for over twenty-five years and in all that time has established success.

It has been adopted for, more than a hundred public monuments and by thousands of delighted individuals in all parts of the country. Many granite dealers have used White Bronze in preference to granite for their own burial plots.

We have hundreds of beautiful designs at prices from $4 to $4,000. We deal direct and allow no agents anywhere. Distance is no obstacle. Write us at once for designs and information if you are interested, stating about what expense you anticipate. It costs nothing and puts you under no obligations whatever. Over $60,000 worth of work sold to Christian Herald readers in the last few years. AGENTS WANTED.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Light on the Exile

Mrs. M. Baxter's New Book on the Life and Writings of the Prophet Ezekiel*

DEEP interest will be stirred in the mind of every reader of Mrs. M. Baxter's just published work on the prophet Ezekiel. Occasionally, during the past few months, we have published extracts from advance sheets, but now, that the book is completed form has reached us, its charm and force are better realized. There is so much that is enigmatic in the prophet's writings, that despite the wondrous beauty of his imagery, the mind is left of a guide who can explain for us, not only the circumstances which evoked the various passages, but also their broader application to the situation of the church in later times, and especially to the times in which we live. Such a guide Mrs. Baxter proves to be in her lucid work.

The subject is a fascinating one. Ezekiel, like his fellow-exile, Daniel, was a man of intense piety, profoundly convinced that the misery which had fallen upon his people was the result, not of God having forsaken his people, as they thought, but of their having forsaken him. He was convinced, too, that the love of God toward them was unaltered, and that when they realized the fact and returned to their loyalty, but not until then, would God restore them to their beloved land. To make them understand this fact, Ezekiel delivered the series of seven discourses, which make up the book of his prophecy.

The picture of Ezekiel in Babylon is very impressive. He was apparently among the first of the captives carried away by Nebuchadnezzar. The mighty king wanted to cripple the Jewish nation, which was continually revolting from its allegiance to him. He thought that if he took away their king, their statesmen, their foremost priests and their most valiant soldiers, the poor and common people, whom he left behind, would be too weak to give him any further trouble. Ezekiel, was one of those whom he carried away to Babylon. We do not know to which of the classes he belonged, but from the few hints he gives us, and from the character of his writing, we should judge that he was both a prince and a priest. He was evidently a young man, for he lived in Babylon at least twenty-seven years after his arrival. But it is clear that he was not so young as to be ignorant of the character and teaching of Jeremiah. The latter's prophecies exercised a powerful influence over his mind, as his writings show, and though he does not refer to him by name, it is clear that he deeply revered the teacher from whom he was separated. The Jewish aristocracy enjoyed wide liberty in Babylon and were allowed to live as they chose, so long as they abstained from plotting. They were also allowed to communicate with the Jews left behind in Palestine and to receive letters and messages from them. When news arrived, they would naturally meet to discuss it, and from various passages in Ezekiel's book, it appears that his house was one of their meeting-places. After five years of practical silence, Ezekiel began to address them as a prophetic preacher, showing them the significance of the news received, and urging them to take the only means, in repentance and reformation of life, of recovering the favor of God. Ezekiel was disappointed in them, and as he was told (33: 31), the majority came to hear him preach, just to pass away an idle hour, rather than with any intention of giving practical heed to his sermons.

Ezekiel's discourses at first were denunciatory. The first twenty-four chapters are devoted to showing that the God of righteousness punishes iniquity in all nations, and especially in his own people, from whom better things might have been expected. The next eight chapters show how other nations were under condemnation. Then follow seven chapters of comfort and encouragement, and in the last nine chapters, foreseeing the restoration, he plans a constitution for the re-established nation, and even describes a temple, which might be built to replace that of Solomon, which had been destroyed.

Mrs. Baxter's analysis helps the student to get an intelligent comprehension of the prophet's work, and shows how many are the lessons, taught to those proud Jewish exiles by the brilliant preacher, which the modern world still needs to learn.

"THE WHOLE WORLD IS QUEER"

QUAINT PSALMS for QUEER FOLK

BY REV. C. H. YATMAN

PSALM XCIII—Sailor's Psalm

3. The floods have lifted up, O Lord, the floods have lifted up their voice; the floods lift up their waves.

4. The Lord on high is mightier than the noise of many waters, yea, than the mighty waves of the sea.

"THE FLOODS HAVE LIFTED UP"

If I were a sailor I'd make this Psalm my own. Amidst the rush and roar of wave and the howling of the hurricane, when sails go to shreds by the winds and the sun shines not for reckonings, I would shout amidst the tempest: "The Lord on high is mightier than the noise of many waters." As it is, on life's broad sea, I often say, "He is mightier than the billows of great sorrows." Port is just ahead, and there will be calm and quiet and rest soon.

PSALM XCIV—For Proud People

1. O God, to whom vengeance belongeth, shew thyself.

"RENDER A REWARD TO THE PROUD"

2. Lift up thyself, thou Judge of the earth: render a reward to the proud.

3. Lord, how long shall the wicked, how long shall the wicked triumph?

4. How long shall they utter and speak hard things? and all the workers of iniquity boast themselves?

You have to choose between Pride and Piety. God's vengeance goes with the first. God's mercy and love with the last. They that trust in themselves will find eventually when they come to naught, they have nothing to trust in. The feet of the pious may slip, but they do not sink into the mire of eternal misery. Pride goeth before destruction and the closing verse is where they are cut off.

PSALM XCV
Psalm of Worship

6. O come, let us worship and bow down: let us kneel before the Lord our maker.

7. For he is our God; and we are the people of his pasture, and the sheep of his hand.

"LET US KNEEL BEFORE THE LORD"

This Psalm is for universal worship. No chapel or church or cathedral needed. The farmer in the field; the sailor on the sea; the miner in the pit; the watchman on the walls—all alike may pour out praise in these words of spirit and truth, and be accepted in the Beloved. The Psalm ends queerly; one may dwell in a world of worship and yet have neither Rock or rest.

PSALM XCVI
Psalm for the Ungrateful

7. Give unto the Lord, O ye kindreds of the people, give unto the Lord glory and strength.

"BRING AN OFFERING, . . . INTO HIS COURTS"

8. Give unto the Lord the glory due unto his name: bring an offering, and come into his courts.

9. O worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness: fear before him, all the earth.

10. Say among the heathen that the Lord reigneth: the world also shall be established that it shall not be moved: he shall judge the people righteously.

Thankless, thoughtless, ungrateful folk should read verse 8 of this Psalm and join the heavens and earth, the sea and fields and woods in rejoicing over the majesty, strength and beauty of the Lord's doings. When he holds the scales in judgment at last, grateful folk will not be found with the ungrateful, any more than chaff will be found with wheat.

"No, I didn't know," he answered thoughtfully, "but I do know how you have been giving yourself to the saving of that girl, and I thought I'd like to tell you, Kate, that watching you and seeing what religion meant to you, although I rebelled a bit at first, has made a new man of me. I have been thinking, too, of that time when I was a Christian, before I went to college. I feel now as if I'd like myself to help some of the fellows up that are down. I can't talk much about it, Kate, but I suspect that while you thought you were winning one, you have been winning two."

Tears of joy watered the lilies on Katherine's breast as she knelt at the altar with Agnes that day, for when his parents moved forward, from the old family pew, she saw that Tom went, too. As he turned away from the table of the Lord, the table neglected since he was a lad, she caught upon his watch-chain the shine of a little cross.

Health, Strength and a Good Figure

Are More to be Desired than a Pretty Face.

It is just one year since I began to teach physical culture by mail, after 12 years of personal experience in prescribing individual work for women. I have never broken faith with my pupils, but have myself dictated every lesson. Were it not that pupils are finishing their courses daily, I could take no new ones. Fully one-third of the pupils who have worked with me this winter have been recommended to me by pupils who worked with me last year. If your vitality is at a low ebb, if you are troubled with any of the so-called chronic ailments—Constipation, Indigestion, Torpid Liver, Sick Headaches, Nervousness, Sleeplessness; if you are overly large and wish to be reduced (and increase your vitality in reducing); if you are thin and want to put on flesh, you can do so by no better means than a course in scientific physical culture. The experience of hundreds of my pupils would bear me out in this. My work is not physical exercise alone. Women do not wish an athlete's strength, but that roundness and symmetry which has made women's form a model for sculptors and painters, and they want that vivacity and force born of a healthful spirit, which Emerson calls "the ecstacy of life." They want perfect health to make them cheerful wives, helpful companions and better friends.

The following extracts from letters from my pupils are on my desk as I write:

"I believe that my lessons are the best investment I have ever made."

"I just read your last advertisement in a January magazine, and from my own experience I know that you claim no more than you accomplish."

"Have left off my glasses and my eyes seem to be all right."

"My neck and chest are developing finely. I can scarcely believe it is my own neck."

"Have been using my fourth lesson for a week. Abdominal measurement reduced 4 1-2 inches, waist 3 inches."

"If you could have seen me when I first began and see me now, you would not think me the same person."

"I used to be so stoop-shouldered, now I carry myself as well as my friends."

"I have not had a headache for four weeks. Menstruation painless and I can apply myself to mental work all day long and not feel tired and nervous. I think I know how to breathe now."

"I sleep all night, for which I cannot adequately express my thanks."

"Have not had a cold this winter. Have lost 20 pounds in flesh. My friends all note the difference in my size."

"My mother has been taking the exercises with me and has lost entirely the rheumatism which troubled her for so long."

"My constitution is entirely revivied."

"My indigestion has all gone. I can sit down and eat as I have not done for years."

"My complexion is very decidedly clearer and my eyes brighter."

"If the remaining three lessons do me as much good as the first three lessons, you will have done wonders. I am never tired now."

"I wish that more women would wake up and see what could be done for them. I cannot be thankful enough that I have made a start."

"I am still well in the literal sense of the word. Not a cold have I had, and never did I enjoy such wonderful health."

Letters similar to the above come to me from my pupils every day.

If you will write me, I will furnish you with names and addresses of women who have been helped with my work, and for ten cents, I will send you a little booklet, showing you correct lines of the body in poise and movement. If you need me or wish to know more of my work, I will cheerfully give you all information I can.

CHRISTIAN HERALD

SKETCHED FROM LIFE FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

BY G. W. PETERS

FINNISH IMMIGRANTS ARRIVING AT THE PORT OF NEW YORK

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Mrs. John C., Kirksville, Mo. Where did the saying, "Cleanliness is next to godliness," originate?

The aphorism first appeared in the Beraitha, as the last Mishna of Sola—a sacred book of the Hindoos.

John L., Dasie, O. What crime did Socrates commit for which he was condemned in Athens? Was it before or after Paul preached at Mars' Hill?

The charge was that he neglected his country's gods, introduced new divinities, and corrupted the Athenian youth. Socrates was born about 468 B.C., more than 500 years before Paul's time.

Mrs. L. H., Huscher, Kan. In this free Gospel land of ours, must a Christian necessarily be persecuted, as evidence that he is a true Christian, as some teach?

Not necessarily. If he be fortunately placed amid Christian influences, he will meet encouragement rather than persecution. Many, however, encounter opposition from relatives, or are in employment which is uncongenial and unfavorable to spiritual progress; but these differences may be surmounted by patience and prayer. There is no such thing here, however, as religious persecution, in the sense in which it is still experienced in many lands where religious liberty has not been granted to the people.

Inquirer, Brooklyn. When your child fails every time to perform some necessary task well, what should you do?

This is a big question. Froebel lays it down as a principle that a child should never be allowed to fail in a task: that his work should be so adapted that he will succeed every time, and that he should be led step by step to something more difficult. This means that a parent must know a child before assigning a task—must have tested the child's powers by degrees. The mistake once made of wrong assignment can be rectified, doubtless, if the parent has patience. He might begin all over again and give the task out little by little until the child has succeeded; or if judgment dictates, change the task at once to something he knows the child can do.

C. H. Harris, New Haven, Conn. Who is it to whom Christ refers (Matt. 10:28) "who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell?"

Stier and some other writers contend that it is Satan to whom Christ refers; but the context, in our opinion, disproves the theory. The whole tenor of the chapter is directed to encouraging men to trust in God and to fear offending him. Christ shows in the following verse how God's control covers all life, and that without his permission no life is lost. Christ does not teach us anywhere to fear Satan, but to rejoice that, through himself, Satan has been overcome. In this passage the contrast is between the fear of man on the one hand, which might lead us to keep away from Christ or desert him lest we should be persecuted; and the fear, on the other hand, of God whose power is infinite in extent, and whom we should dread to displease.

Mrs. J. A. H., Rankin, Ill. I see by a notice from Dublin, in one of our papers, that a large force of workmen are excavating the top of the famous Hill of Tara, in the hope of discovering traces of the Ark of the Covenant, which members of the local historic society claim was buried there." The idea is based on this reasoning: "During the stay of the Jews in Egypt many of them fell back into idolatry, and this so annoyed the prophet Jeremiah that he fled, with a number of others, to seek refuge in one of the Israelitish colonies of the tribe of Dan (Denmark). This is concluded from the last verse of the forty-fifth chapter of Jeremiah. He carried with him the Ark, containing two tablets of stone upon which the Commandments were inscribed. His ship was wrecked on the coast of Ireland, whose youthful king fell in love with one of the King of Judah's daughters, who accompanied Jeremiah. The prophet allowed the king to marry her, upon the condition that he should establish a college at Tara and promote learning and religion. This the king promised, and upon the death of his wife, he raised a cairn, 'The Hill of Tara,' overlies it, and buried he with her the Ark and other relics."

Now, I certainly cannot find anything in the forty fifth chapter of Jeremiah, or in other chapters, to confirm this. As I understand it, Jeremiah was in Palestine, and the Jews in Egypt were those who had left Palestine with the intention of worshiping idols in Egypt. I can see nothing indicating a moving to Israelitish colonies. What authority is there that the Jewish colonies extended so far, and that the Danites were in Ireland?

There is no reliable historical information on the subject, but there are many legends and traditions. One of the latter states that a granddaughter of Noah led the first colony into Ireland; another, that Gomer, eldest son of Japheth, was the progenitor of the Celts. We should be disposed to class the traditions you mention in the same category. There are no means of proof or disproof, and, as they are not authenticated, they do not merit consideration by the student.

Concerning the custom of placing a bush or broom on the peak of a newly-finished dwelling, Subscriber, New York City, writes:

Centuries ago, it was a custom, when the frame or walls of a house approached completion, to place upon the summit a cross. This was to commemorate the last words of our Saviour, "It is finished." In later years, both in prose and poetry, the cross was spoken of as a tree. Gradually the cross, as a symbol, was omitted, and a small tree used in its place; but as small trees were not always available, a bush of any kind was used, which custom is still in use. The symbols have changed, but the idea symbolized remains the same.

Carl M., Saratoga, Calif., writes:

In regard to the question of the "Origin of the man in the moon?" I would say that among the Jews we say, "that it is Joshua's face in the moon and Moses' face in the sun." The ground for the belief is in the fact that Moses had the sun to stand still, and Joshua the moon. May it not be that this is the origin to the "man in the moon?"

Mrs. J. P. W., Toomsuba, Miss. While we cordially sympathize with such individual cases of suffering as we frequently meet with, we believe it to be the duty of Christian people living in the same section to take up the burden of helping such local cases. General appeals are only justified where large numbers are involved, and where the suffering extends over a wide area.

K. L. S., Matawan, N. J. Is there still a demand for the Gospel of St. John in Spanish and English, and if so, how can I best assist in meeting it.

Yes, these little books are greatly appreciated by both English and Spanish-speaking people. Chaplain Oliver C. Miller, of the 13th U. S. Cavalry, writes: "I have used to great advantage the Gospel of St. John in Spanish and English, and as I am now ordered to return to the Philippines, I write to ask you if you can send me a grant of these books, as I find that many officers and men read the Gospel of St. John in order to learn Spanish." These little books are bound in durable leatherette with red edges, and contain a number of Gospel Hymns following the Gospel. On receipt of twenty-five cents, five copies will be sent to Chaplain Miller at Manila, and an additional copy, free of charge, to the person sending us the money.

C. H. S., Rosendale, Wis. Your letter on dancing is very clever and amusing, but we believe you would both think and write in a different vein if you gave the subject due consideration. In dancing, as in cards, theatricals, etc., there is no harm per se, but you should surely consider the association which the love of dancing, card-playing and theatre-going implies. There is where the harm lies. Any father who wishes his daughter well, does not wish her to be subjected to the promiscuous acquaintanceships, the doubtful companionships of the ball-room, where she must inevitably meet persons at times who would never be considered fit to be invited to her home. If you desire to keep your children pure and honorable, keep them from evil associates, who are common in every dancing and card-playing community.

Schoolboy, Walla Walla, Wash. 1. Is the widow of Tennyson living? 2. Is she a writer?

1. Lady Emily Tennyson, widow of the poet laureate, died August 10, 1896, four years after her husband, at Aldworth House, England. 2. She was a poet.

V. C. Philomath, Ind. I read in a local paper that the Catholics had in Constantinople, I think some pious relics, as the robe the Virgin Mary wore at Christ's birth, and the swaddling clothes, and others, which are shown every seven years.

These and many kindred so-called "relics" belong to a class of monkish impositions which were very rife some centuries ago, but to which nobody now gives the slightest credence.

D. B. F., Marlton, N. J. Can a person who has joined a church which forbids theatre-going, expect to be saved if he goes to the theatre?

That is a hard-and-fast line to draw, and one that lacks divine authority. It is crude and arbitrary. The Christian is one who has the Christ spirit, who is trusting in Him, seeking to be like him and to know and do his will. We cannot understand how such an one can find pleasure in theatre-going and should expect that his thoughts and feelings would lead him to very different places for enjoyment. But that is a matter for his own conscience. It is not for you, or us, or any church, to say that he will be excluded from heaven for any such cause.

Margaret D., Plainfield, N. J. How did Scotland Yard, in London, come to be so named?

It was once the site of a palace, built for the reception of the Scottish princes when they visited the English capital, and which was given by King Edgar of England to Kenneth of Scotland. When the palace was removed and the present detective headquarters built, the latter was not inappropriately named "Scotland Yard."

G. S. R., Columbia, Pa., writes:

I am teaching a Bible class of men in the Presbyterian Sunday School, of Columbia, Pa. I have in my class six brothers: George, Thomas, Richard, Martin, John and William Caley. Their names appear here in the order in which they joined the class. Has any other Sunday School teacher who reads THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, an experience similar to mine? It would be interesting to know if there is any other Bible class of men with such a record.

The late Dr. Joseph Parker of England was a fine poet as well as a famous preacher. The following lines, entitled "Death Confronted," were among the last to come from his pen:

"Why break our hearts and mock our thirst
With the brine of useless tears? O death! I would That thou were dead."
"I understand thee well," said Death, "but thou dost not Understand thyself. Why does God send this cold snow
Before the spring? Why icebergs first, then daffodils?
My grimness, too, thou dost not comprehend.
The living have never seen me. Only the dying
Can see Death. I am but a mask. The angel thou
Doth pine for is behind. Sometimes angel-mother
Sometimes father, sometimes a vanished love,
But always to the Good and True the very image of the Christ!"

THE SCENE OF THE RESURRECTION

VISITORS to Jerusalem are taken to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, and are there shown the stone on which the body of Christ is said to have been laid; the place on which he stood when he appeared to Mary, and other objects which pilgrims have visited with veneration for hundreds of years. More careful scholars, however, in modern times, have pointed out the difficulties there are in accepting the site. Mr. Fisher Howe, of Brooklyn, N. Y., was the first to put them in tabulated form, and to point out another site, which corresponds more clearly to the narratives of the Gospels. One strong objection to the traditional site is that it is, and always has been, within the city walls; whereas we know that Calvary was outside, and the Sepulchre was in a garden "nigh at hand." There is just such a site outside the Damascus Gate of Jerusalem. It is a knoll, in the side of which are two large holes, giving it, at a distance, the appearance of a skull, which is the name given to Calvary by Matthew (27:33). Dr. Selah Merrill, Dr. C. S. Robinson, Gen. Gordon, Sir J. W. Dawson and Col. Conder all agree with Mr. Howe, that this knoll, known as Jeremiah's Grotto, is Calvary, the site of the Crucifixion. The sepulchre must have been near it. (See John 19:40-42). Such a tomb has been found, and a photograph of it is given here. It was hewn out of the rock, and was evidently the property of a rich man, thus corresponding to the record. Passing through the entrance shown in the illustration, a vestibule is reached, from which, by two steps, the visitor descends to an inner chamber, in which the body was laid. The author of the "Leeper Lesson Helps," to which this illustration belongs, adds that a striking corroboration of the theory that this is the veritable sepulchre has been found. It is, that on another rock-hewn tomb, near at hand, is the inscription: "Buried near his Lord."

AN ILLUSTRATED FAMILY MAGAZINE

A MACEDONIAN PEASANT DANCE NEAR MONASTIR — A MACEDONIAN FAMILY — MACEDONIANS OF EXHIBITING THEIR SKILL

Macedonia's Gallant Struggle For Freedom

MACEDONIA, the land of Philip and of Alexander, the cradle of an empire whose founder sighed for more worlds to conquer, after many centuries of comparative obscurity, once more attracts the anxious gaze of mankind. It is not the Macedonia of old, or even its shadow. A few crumbling remnants alone tell of cities from which went forth the victors of ssus and Arbela. Their very race is extinct, and its ace has long been taken by descendants of those whom e ancient Greeks regarded as barbarians.

Modern Macedonia is a part of European Turkey. It is t the name of any political division of the Ottoman Empire, it is applied indefinitely to the region included in the three oyinces of Kossova, Monastir and Salonica, wedged in between Adrianople on the east, Albania on the west, the ee or autonomous Balkan States and Bosnia, occupied by ustria, on the north, and the Ægean Sea on the south. hese three provinces have an area a little more than thirty ousand square miles in extent, or almost equal in size to e State of South Carolina, and a total population of about o and three-quarter millions, nearly all Christians of the lgarian or the Greek churches, the former greatly in the ajority.

It is a sad fact that the religious animosities between ulgarians and Greeks, are almost as bitter as the hatred the Moslem toward Christians of all denominations. he Greek population is chiefly in the important city of Sala and elsewhere on the Ægean shore, while the interior of acedonia is occupied almost entirely by peasants of the ulgarian race, with a mingling of Greek merchants and urkish officials and residents. It is between the Bulgarians d the Turks that the present struggle is being carried on, a ruggle which may start a great war in Eastern Europe, and hich, apart from this possibility is of pre-eminent interest ecause it is, in all probability, the last of the conflicts beeen Christian communities in Europe and their Turkish ppressors. Greece, Servia, Roumania, Montenegro and lgaria are free, save that the last named State is in nominal vassalage to the Sultan. Albania is chiefly Moslem, and Macedonia alone remains, her Christian people enduring horrors which show how little the Turk has advanced since the days when cruel slavery or horrible torture was the fate of the "infidel" captured in arms.

Macedonia is a rugged and also a fertile land, including broad masses of mountains and extensive sweeps of lowland, with a hardy peasantry, which has learned, through many years of misrule, an unquenchable hatred of the Turk. Every spring witnesses outbreaks, but in the present and the two preceding seasons, these outbreaks have been more formidable than before to Turkish power, and amount to a general uprising by the Christian inhabitants of Kossova and Monastir, and a large part of Salonica. Had the Christian Powers of Europe done their duty twenty-five years ago, when the Treaty of Berlin was signed, and Bulgaria was liberated from the Turkish yoke, Macedonia, too, would have received self-government, and would doubtless have escaped the horrors which now afflict its population. But "everybody's business" was neglected, as is too often the case, and now Europe has to dispose of a problem then simple enough, but which has grown in gravity with intervening years.

The anarchy, insecurity, and intolerance of all creeds calling themselves Christian, which prevail wherever the Turk has full sway, sufficiently accounts for conditions in Macedonia. There is no foreign influence there to restrain Turkish greed, licentiousness and cruelty. The Albanian Moslems, who are brigands by nature and training, prey on the Christian Macedonians from the western boundary, while Turkish levies from Asia, whose idea of soldiering is comprised in murder and plunder, inflict all sorts of outrages on the wretched inhabitants whom they are supposed to protect. Violence has provoked violence, until the Macedonians regard revenge as the only means of redress for Turkish crimes, and if Macedonia is not in continual revolution, it is only because the winter season is too severe for active hostilities. But with the melting of the snows the mountaineer descends to renew his warfare with the Turk, and the waters of the Vardar, of which Homer spoke as "the fairest stream that flows in all the earth," is often reddened by sanguinary strife between the peasantry and their tyrants.

The Macedonians are not without active aid and sympathy. Their brethren of Bulgaria have crossed by hundreds and thousands into the afflicted land to join in battle against the hereditary foe. Prince Ferdinand, ruler of Bulgaria, has made efforts, more or less sincere, to maintain neutrality, and even caused the arrest of Colonel Zontcheff, head of the Macedonian committees in Bulgaria, for his part in assisting the insurgents. This action did not lessen the zeal of Bulgarian sympathizers with Macedonia, and they are still hurrying in bands to the frontier to help in the revolt, which, according to latest advices, is spreading like a prairie fire through the Macedonian provinces.

Russia and Austria, acting in combination, have secured from the Sultan promises of reform in Turkish treatment of the Macedonians, and these Powers are said to be halting for the time being as to further action, to see whether the promises are kept. The Macedonians and Bulgarians evidently have, however, no faith in the Turk, and the former are fighting for their lives, while diplomats are mincing over the Sultan's fair words at Constantinople.

The horrors of Turkish warfare are too well known to need depicting, and there is abundant evidence that the Macedonians are suffering the worst forms of savage cruelty known to the Asiatic horde which the Sultan has poured into that hapless European dominion. The descriptions of these cruelties recall the barbarities inflicted upon their captives by North American Indians. Worse even than death is the treatment of the Bulgarian wives and daughters by the brutal Turkish soldiery. The Bulgarians, on their part, do not spare the Turks when the latter fall into their hands, and massacre by one side or the other, is the usual termination of a conflict.

The leader of the Macedonians is Lieut. Colonel Jankoff, who is reported to have a considerable force under his command. His proclamation, recently issued, has a patriotic ring.

All indications point to the beginning of the end of Turkish rule in Macedonia. The Christians of that unhappy region will doubtless have yet much to undergo before that end is accomplished. The horrors of Turkish oppression in Bulgaria were never so fearful as just before deliverance came. Macedonian conditions have come to that acute stage when even the most callous European statesmen cannot long ignore the aroused conscience of the people, which, when awakened, is irresistible. Christian Europe will not look calmly on at Moslem fanatics wasting out of existence nearly three millions of Christians in Macedonia.

A simple, honest, plain people, doing their best to live good lives so far as they are permitted by their masters, the Turks, the Macedonians well deserve the sympathy of nations more fortunately situated. With peace restored, and appeal to reason and justice taking the place of unspeakable Turkish brutality, Macedonia would undoubtedly be an excellent field for missionary labor. The kidnapping of the American missionary, Helen M. Stone, and the Bulgarian convert, Madame Tsilka, captured by brigands in September, 1901, and to whose ransom readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD generously contributed, called the attention of Americans in a signal manner to the disturbed conditions in the region which is now the scene of fierce struggle between Christian and Turk. Miss Stone, notwithstanding her unhappy experience, expressed a most favorable view of European Turkey as a land where workers for Christ might reap a rich harvest of souls, and the cry from Macedonia, which touched the heart of the apostle Paul, should not be unheeded now by the nations whom God has favored with the light of the Gospel.

A THREEFOLD OUTLOOK

A Sermon by REV. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN*

TEXT, Luke 4: 27, R.V.—"And there were many lepers in Israel in the time of Elisha the prophet; and none of them was cleansed, but only Naaman the Syrian"

REV. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN

I THANK God that the New Testament comes after the Old, and that the words of Jesus light up for us that old-time story of Naaman the Syrian with great suggestiveness. From the words of the Master we find that Naaman had a second "but" in his life. We were introduced to the first one in the Old Testament, and it was full of sadness. He was a great man with his master; he was honorable; he was rich—BUT he was a leper! Now, Jesus says "there were many lepers in Israel, . . . and none of them was cleansed BUT only Naaman." Naaman got into blessing. Naaman found a place where the leprosy passed absolutely out of his life. Sweetest word of all, it seems to me, in that story—"his flesh came again as the flesh of a little child."

The law of life in the physical realm, as revealed in the healing of Naaman, is the law of life in the spiritual realm. The Master confronts all those smitten with leprosy, the leprosy of sin; and he says to us: "Except ye turn and become as little children ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven."

I do not propose to dwell at any length upon the story of Naaman. It is familiar to us all. We know all its points and its beauties. My business is to find out how we may get the second "but" into our lives. We are all conscious that the first "but" is there—at least, if we are not, we shall never find our way into the second. We are all ready to say:

"It is quite true that we have almost unnumbered blessings, health, reason, friends, and countless mercies; BUT we are sinners."

The supreme question for every one of us is, how we may obtain the experience of the second "but," not theoretically, but actually, definitely, positively, that it may also be said of each of us: "But he was cleansed."

There is a very terrible revelation in the word which Jesus utters about Israel: "There were many lepers in Israel."

The Stained Record

Lepers in Israel! Lepers among the children of the covenant! Men and women living right in the region of blessing and yet lepers. How absolutely and utterly useless was privilege to them, because they did not make use of it; because they did not take hold of the great blessing of God which was theirs as a nation, and in the covenant, and appropriate it to themselves! Yet this man outside of the covenant; this man who had not lived in the realm of privilege; this man who had not been brought up in the knowledge of the oracles of God; this man who knew nothing in his family or in his past history of the wonderful working power of the Most High; this outsider passed into blessing, while the men who were inside missed it!

The great truth that is impressed upon our minds from this thought is that it is not enough that you and I have been among the privileged people; it is not enough that we know the power of God; it is not enough that we have been brought up and nurtured in the fear of the Lord; there must be a personal appropriation of all the blessing presented to us in Christ, or else we miss the blessing. "And they shall come from the east and west, and from the north and south, and shall sit down in the kingdom of God" while the children of the kingdom are "cast forth without." It is not enough that we know these things. We must do them.

I want to say a word first as to the need of every heart that has found the first "but" in their lives. Then a word as to the message of the Gospel to such needy hearts. And then I want to press home a final practical message.

I believe there is a general conviction of need. People generally agree that they need the pardon and the cleansing that Christ alone can bring; but I want, if I may, to analyze that general sense of need, and ask as through my own heart's experience: "What do I need?"

I answer it by a threefold statement: (1) I need that something shall be done with regard to yesterday; (2) I need that something shall be done with regard to to-day; (3) I need that something shall be done with regard to to-morrow.

I need that something shall be done with regard to yesterday; for yesterday was the day of sin. The years that have passed have been years of wrong-doing, actual wrong-doing; years of carnal, self-pleasing rebellion against God. What am I going to do with these years? Suppose that I now surrender myself to Christ, accepting his invitation—what about the past? I need that something shall be done with the past, or else I can have no peace, no sense of purity, no blessing.

And then I know that something must be done in the present moment. Supposing it be possible to deal with the deeds of the past I shall still be the same being; still in my own nature there will be that which will propel me towards wrong, and towards sin, and therefore I shall still be unacceptable to God. I need forgiveness. I need also the consciousness of acceptance with God.

And then, when I have faced these two needs, if there be a message in the Gospel that shall meet my need as to the yesterday of my life, and the to-day of my life, I still have another need. I look out to the future. I see to-morrow coming on, with the same old forms of temptation, the same old suggestions to evil from without, and I reverently say that if God forgave me yesterday, and accept me to-day, yet I am helpless unless he make some special provision for me to-morrow.

Pardon, Purity, Power

The general sense of the need is analyzed for my own heart when I take this threefold outlook upon my life.—yesterday, to-day, to-morrow. And what need I? I need first of all pardon for the past; I need that in the present moment purity shall be given to me in order that my nature shall be changed, and I shall be accepted with God; and for to-morrow I need power for all that may come. Pardon, purity, and power; pardon for yesterday; purity for to-day; power for to-morrow. I stand amid the years of my life, coming and going so swiftly that they seem to glide away before I know it, and I say:

"In the past I have sinned; I want pardon. In the present I am impure; can I have purity? And to-morrow—I dread it, because of my own weakness—can there be for me a power that shall come into my life, and energize me in the future?"

Now, is not this the Gospel that you have heard through all your lives? Is not every need thus expressed, met in the message that Jesus Christ sends to you again to-day?

What about the past? He meets you by his Cross, and he says to you: "I will blot out, as a thick cloud, thy transgressions." Do you know what it is to blot out a transgression? Do you know what it is to have sin put away at the Cross of Christ? He does it by his own blood-shedding.

But what is this blessing of the blotting out of sin?

A boy ran in to his mother one day after he had read that promise. "I will blot out, as a thick cloud, thy transgressions." And he said: "Mother, what does God mean when he says he will blot out my sins? What is he going to do with them? I can't see how God can really blot them out and put them away. What does it mean—blot out?" The mother, who is always the best theologian for a child, said to the boy: "Didn't I see you yesterday writing on your slate?" "Yes," he said. "Well, show it to me." He brought his slate to his mother, who holding it in front of him, said: "Where is what you wrote?" "Oh," he said, "I rubbed it out." "Well, where is it?" "Why, mother, I don't know." "But how could you put it away if it was really there?" "Oh, mother, I don't know. I know it was there, and it is gone." "Well," she said, "that is what God meant when he said, 'I will blot out thy transgressions.'"

My brother, are you troubled about the past? Are sins of the past haunting you to-day? I do not ask you to make a list of them—you cannot do it; but I ask you to remember that the list is made. The whole black list of sins is before thee, and there comes thy way to-day the Man of sorrows and of tears, the Man of suffering and of triumph, and he says: "I will blot out thy transgressions."

But I need more than that: I need purity; I need to know that I am accepted by God. And again he calls me to his Cross, and at the Cross he tells me that he will not only forgive sins, but cleanse from all unrighteousness. He tells me that he will take my nature, and purify it, and make it like unto his own; and that in him, and in the power of his life communicated to me, I shall be accepted of God.

Hope for the Future

"Ah, but what about to-morrow? How am I going to manage to-morrow?"

The Master bends over the trembling soul that asks that question, and says: "Lo, I am with you always."

Some years ago, in Scotland, a Scotch lord gave to his old servant Donald, a little farm. He called him in one day and said: "Donald, I am going to give you that farm, that you may work it for yourself, and spend the rest of your days there upon your own property." Donald, with all the canniness that characterises a Scotchman, looked up into the face of his lord, and said to him: "It is nae gude to gie me the farm; I have nae capital to stock it." His lordship looked at him, and said: "Oh, Donald, I think I can manage to stock it also." And Donald said: "Oh, well, if it is you and m for it, I think we will manage."

Trembling soul, if Christ Jesus pardoned thee, if h purified thee, then say to him: "Now, Lord, I than thee for the pardon; I magnify thee for the purity; bu Master, I have no capital; how am I going to live in th future?" And he says: "He that spared not his ow son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he nc also with him freely give us all things? Lo, I am wit you." "Jesus, Master, if it be thee and me for it, w can manage."

Thus far we have seen the need, and the provision yesterday, pardon; to-day, purity; to-morrow, powe The Gospel of Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-da and forever; pardoning the past, purifying to-day, an energizing for every moment of the pathway to glory.

Now we come to the point of actual dealing with Go for ourselves. I cannot help you here, except to sa what Naaman's servants said: "Try it." Even if yo are very weak and trembling and doubting, never minc Try it. Venture on God. Take some risk in th matter. Two men in the life of Jesus came to him—an one never can read the story of either without feelin how poor was the faith of each.

One said: "Lord if thou wilt, thou canst." Don you see, he wasn't perfectly sure that the Master wa willing, but he ventured on him. He came to him on crutch, because he could not walk straight, and th crutch was a little "if"—"if thou wilt."

The other had to get another crutch, a crutch for th other side, and he said: "If thou canst do somethin for my boy, do it." And how did the Master deal wit this man? Did he say, "No, I cannot help you; you faith is not strong enough; you haven't confidenc enough"? Not he. If a man got to him, he didn care. It is better for a man to come with, "Lord, tho canst," "thou wilt," and "I believe"; but if you cann come that way, come the other way. Come with you "if." "Lord, if thou canst make me clean, do it; only come to thee."

A Sensible Committee

Do you remember those four leprous men that sat i the gate of the city of Samaria? One of the mo sensible committees that ever sat in the history of th world, was that committee of starvation. There in th city of Samaria famine stared them in the face. Th host of the besieging army had cut the city off fro supplies. The committee of four lepers held one of th only committee meetings I ever cared to attend; and like to go there, and watch these men as, discussing th situation, they propose a resolution, and carry it. Wh is the resolution? Said they: [II. Kings 7: 3–9.]

"What do we sitting here? If we go into the city w shall die. That is very evident. If we sit still here w shall die. If we go down to the host of Syria, whi they may save us alive, they may kill us. That is the ou look: first, certain death in the city; secondly, certai death sitting here; thirdly, half a chance of life dow yonder. We move as a resolution that we turn our bac upon the certain death in the city, certain death in th gateway, and venture upon the half chance of life dow yonder."

Wasn't that a sensible thing for a committee to do And you know how it worked. They took the ha chance of life, and found that it wasn't only a chance life, but it was more abundant life, life for everyboc except the men who didn't believe God could do it.

My brother, I want you to come to Jesus Christ th way now, if you feel that you cannot come any oth way. It is certain death to go back to the old life. is certain death to sit in the gateway sighing for virtu and never finding it. You are not quite sure Jesus ca do for you what he has done for others, but you thir he may. Then try him on the off chance! Venture o him. Come to him now and say: "Lord, if thou can do anything with such as I am—Lord, I give myself thee!"

How will it work? Many a believer could tell you

> I came to Jesus as I was—
> Weary, and worn, and sad;
> I found in him a resting place,
> And he has made me glad.

Accept that testimony. Come, venture on him.

How was it that Naaman nearly missed cleansing Two things very nearly wrecked his faith. The fir was: "Behold, I thought"—preconceived notions how God was going to deal with him; and the secor was: "Are not Abana and Pharpar better than th Jordan?"—an attempt to dictate terms to God as to ho he should get healed. First of all, he had an idea as how God should work, and because God was not goi to work that way, he nearly missed his blessing; a then he wanted to say that he knew a better way Abana and Pharpar were better rivers than the mud Jordan.

fety. "I thought"—what did you think? Did you ink God was coming to wave over you some magi- an's wand, and give you some strange feeling? He ver does. His way is the way of obedience. "To e Jordan! Dip seven times! To Christ, in absolute andonment of self!" Along that line only comes his essing. And the only way in which some men and omen will ever get through into salvation or sanctifi- tion is to sweep out of their life, by a determined ef- rt of their will, all preconceived notions, and to say: h, God, get thy way, in thy way, whatever I think."

The other danger is that we want to dictate terms. hat is so often done. I remember years ago conduc- g a mission, and at the back of the chapel sat a man. the very first after-meeting, as I moved around speak- g to various persons, I came to that man. I found the ly Spirit of God had been dealing with him, but he oked at me, and said—I had been inviting people to me out into an inquiry-room: "Can't I be saved thout going in there?"

Now, when a man begins to ask that question you st deal with him just in one way. And I said: o; I don't think you can." "Why," he said, "is sal- tion in the inquiry-room?" "No, it is in God; but st as long as you sit here and want to dictate terms to od, you are proving that you have not got to the end self, and there is no salvation for you. That is the trouble with you." "Then," he said, "if I cannot be saved without going into that room, I will go to hell." "My brother," I answered, "that is not God's choice for you. If you have chosen it for yourself I cannot help it."

Every night that man came and sat there. Oh, how gracious God is! He does not take us at our word. He does not leave us alone when we have said some rash, foolhardy thing. I had warned the workers, and said: "Don't talk to that man. Leave him alone. Let God have his way with him." I shall never forget the last night of the mission. Before I had time to ask a soul to move, that man came forward over the backs of the seats to the altar. I looked at him and said: "I thought you were going to hell, my brother?" He said: "Oh, I have been there all the week." Praise God! it does a man good to get there a little while that way sometimes.

As long as you are dictating terms—"Can't I be saved right here?"—you are likely to miss the blessing. You can be saved there. You can be saved without a man knowing of it at the time. Somebody is bound to know of it soon, however. Nobody ever became a Christian without it flaming out sooner or later. Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea both tried to be Christians in private; but by and by there came the day of crucifixion, and these two men got the body of the dead Christ, and laid it to his last rest. You cannot be a Christian and keep it under a bushel long; the light will either go out or set the bushel on fire. The way think you can get to Jesus Christ quietly, but as long as you are trying to dictate terms, as long as you are saying, "I don't like this noisy, babbling, rushing, muddy stream of Jordan; let me have the quiet, placid, crystal waters of Abana," just so long you are in a condition for blessing. It is when you come to say, "Anywhere that he points the way, any means that he mentions to me, any cross he puts in front of me, I will take up and go to him to have his cleansing," when you come there, then they are in the way of blessing. There were many lepers in Israel, but none of them were cleansed save Naaman; and he was cleansed because he entered into the spirit of true relationship to God by obeying. And there are many who are suffering from the leprosy of sin for there, and they only will have cleansing when in the divinely marked way come to him who alone can cleanse, and abandoning all preconceived notions, and sweeping aside every temptation to dictate terms, say

Just as I am, without one plea,
But that thy blood was shed for me,
And that thou bidd'st me come to thee,
O, Lamb of God, I come! I come!
In spite of all my unbelief,
In spite of all my many griefs,
In spite of all the powers of hell,
And that my soul is sick to feel,
O, Lamb of God, I come! I come!

God help us all so to come!

GOSPEL WORK IN BRAZIL

MR. AND MRS. REGINALD J. YOUNG'S EVANGELISTIC LABORS RECEIVING A BLESSING

LETTERS recently received from Mr. Reginald J. Young, whose work in Brazil was described in these columns some weeks ago, contain most encouraging news. As our readers will remember, Mr Young and his wife began their labors in Brazil only three years ago, and without the support of any denominational board, simply went from house to house, carrying God's Word and talking with the people as they had opportunity. Gradually preaching services were commenced, and converts were won, who are already carrying the good news of salvation to others. The city of Sao Paulo has been thoroughly canvassed, and there is now there a large congregation of attentive hearers, many of whom have made profession of faith.

Among the early converts was Senor Samuel Mello, a business man of considerable means. How deeply did the Spirit operate upon his mind, that he determined to abandon his business and devote himself and his property to the Lord's service. For several months after quitting business life, he spent his whole time in the study of the New Testament, under Mr. Young's guidance. At the end of that time he began to give addresses in Gospel meetings, which were wonderfully owned of God. Through his thorough acquaintance with the people he has acquired a happy manner of address, tactful and convincing, and full of shrewd, apt illustrations which hold the attention of his hearers. After working for some time with Mr. Young in Sao Paulo, he bought a troop of mules, which he loaded with Bibles, Testaments and portions. With these he set out on a long evangelistic tour through the States of Parana, Santa Catherina, and Rio Grande do Sul.

Everywhere he disposed of Bibles and Testaments, selling them when he could, and giving them away when he met people anxious to possess them but unable to buy. Occasionally he would hold a Gospel service, assisted by two friends who accompanied him on the tour. On reaching Paranagua, an important city on the sea coast, he canvassed the city and preached on the street. So attentive and earnest were the people that he hired a hall for longer services. Here the audience numbered fully five hundred persons. There were many inquirers among them, and Senor Mello decided to stay and prosecute the work. He has been there four months, holding services every night. The number of persons who are now attending regularly and have definitely cut loose from old associations, and are regarded as inquirers, is over two hundred and fifty, while seventy have already made profession of faith, and are proving by their changed life the sincerity of their conversion. Mr. Young has now sent an experienced evangelist, Mr. Glass, to the aid of Senor Mello, in order that the latter may proceed as he desires to other places. There has been some persecution in the town, but the converts remain firm, and a subscription has already been started to buy land and erect a mission station.

Eight of the twenty-one States of Brazil have so far been reached with the Gospel. Though an extended sale has not been made at many cities, the circulation of the Word of God must inevitably produce results, which will be seen at the next visit. Since Mr. Young began work three years ago, he and his helpers have disposed of 1,137 Bibles, 3,102 Testaments, and 1,072 separate Gospels. Considering the fact that these volumes are prohibited, and that the people run a risk in having them in their possession, the circulation is remarkable, indicating a striking degree of interest from which much good may be hoped.

This work has developed from small beginnings, extending as the workers availed themselves of opportunities. It looks now as if it would permeate the whole of Brazil, for each little company is no sooner grounded in the truth than it looks around for missionary work. Of all the fourteen evangelists now at work, under Mr Young's direction, all but one—Mr. Glass—are Brazilian converts, won for Christ during the past three years. Mr. Young says that hitherto there has been no difficulty in the matter of funds. Whenever a need has arisen, money from some source or other, has come in. He is confident that God will continue to provide the means as they are needed. When funds are in hand, a church will be built at Sao Paulo, and efforts will be made to reach States not yet entered. As announced two weeks ago in these columns, Mrs. Young is now in this country for a brief visit: she hopes to take back with her funds for Bible distribution, and for mission work in other States.

EVANGELIST AND MRS. REGINALD J. YOUNG AND SOME OF THE BRAZILIAN CONVERTS

Porto Rico Mission Progress

CHARLES W. DREES, Superintendent of the Methodist Episcopal Mission in Porto Rico, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from San Juan, as follows:

"We have removed our Orphanage, so far as the girls' department is concerned, to San Juan, enlarging its scope, as is indicated by the name it now bears, 'The Girls' Orphanage and Industrial Home.' For our boys' department we are seeking a suitable location, and means for its establishment.

"The Methodist Episcopal Church has its principal stations in San Juan, Arecibo, Guayama and the Island of Vieques. In connection with five missionary charges we have more than twenty preaching places. At several points our work is extending into the hill country and reaching the neglected white peasantry of that region, so completely neglected by the Roman Church.

"A native convert, himself of the class referred to, Juan Vazquez by name, is doing great good in this work.

"In Puerta de Tierra we are following up the beginnings made three years ago under the auspices and with the material aid of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Mission. We have met with very encouraging success in our Sunday School. The former now has a steady and reliable attendance of children and adults and the awakening of spiritual and intellectual life is very remarkable. The school numbers about one hundred, with an average attendance of some sixty or more."

A Syrian Pastor's Testament

DEAR DR. KLOPSCH:—Many thanks for the beautiful Red Letter Testament in German I have presented to an old man, whose appreciative note accepting the same I herewith inclose. Mr. Hanauer is a devoted missionary, an able preacher, and one of the best informed men of Palestine that has ever been in this country. He was born in Jerusalem, was trained under Sir Charles Warren in his extensive excavations here, and for many years has occupied the first rank among experts on the antiquities and topography.

Very sincerely your friend,
SELAH MERRILL, U. S. Consul.
Jerusalem, Syria.

CHRIST CHURCH, JERUSALEM
How and Kyo Sooyo Hanauer, A. M., L. L. D.

DEAR SIR:—Please accept my cordial thanks for the beautifully printed and bound copy of the Red Letter Testament (in two) which I received through you from Dr. Klopsch. It will, I am sure, prove extremely useful. The characteristic features—having our Lord's words printed in such a manner—making that they strike the eye at the first glance—will stand out from the book as a most valuable one. Convey my hearty thanks, and this expression of my gratefulness to Dr. Klopsch.

Yours gratefully,
J. E. HANAUER,
Assistant Clergyman, L. J. S. Church, Jerusalem.

A COOLING DRAUGHT A LITTLE BLACK PATIENT AN IMPROMPTU NURSE GIVING THE MEDICINE

WEALTHY WOMEN NURSE IN THE SLUMS

Volunteer Florence Nightingales, who Labor for Christ among the Poor and Lowly

A YEARNING to become Florence Nightingales of the slums has taken possession of a number of Philadelphia young women, the daughters of wealthy parents. Among others, the daughters of Judge William N. Ashman, of the Orphan's Court, are interested in this new development. The Misses Ashman decided, after reflection, that by nursing the sick poor, they could find a way to that contentment of soul which is sought in vain in the fashionable social circle. They took a course in nursing, and immediately nursing became popular among a number of their rich acquaintances. As a result, a private school for nurses, with headquarters in the Witherspoon Building, has on its staff of volunteers a band of young women who are pledged to answer calls to nurse the sick of the poorest districts at any hour of day or night without remuneration, and to assist, as far as their means allow, in providing medical necessaries for their patients.

The young women are not anxious to let the world know the work they do. The writer obtained permission to accompany a party of volunteer nurses on a visit to the poorer quarters of the city. With the group that left the Witherspoon Building were a Swarthmore graduate and three young women who were heiresses in their own right, but volunteer nurses by choice. The spotless white dress of the conventional attendant of the sick was worn by each beneath a long coat. The caps of the party were carried in a satchel, which also contained delicacies for the sick.

A call had come that morning for an attendant for a patient, whose wife had been unable to nurse him and to support the family as well. When the house was reached, the family was in the depths of despair, and the nurses arrived like a beam of sunshine. One of the nurses took charge of the case, and set about arranging the bed with deft hands, propping him up, smoothing the pillows and applying the lessons learned in the lecture-room.

The remaining trio, after leaving the room, went down a narrow stairway into a sloppy little court, under an archway, down a mean-looking street, and in due time came to the house of an Italian woman, whose baby was sick. There was a large family of children. The Swarthmore graduate took charge here. She soon had the baby undressed, washed, dressed in clean clothes, and feeding contentedly from a bottle of sterilized milk, while the mother poured forth her thanks.

At the next place of call, a joyful greeting was extended to the girls. A very old woman lay sick, tended by her daughter, who could do little for her, she had to work for a living at the same time. T nurses consoled the old invalid, gave her medici shook up her pillows, conjured delicacies from t depths of the satchel, and wiped away the tears th immediately began to flow from the aged woman's ey The old woman and the daughter showered blessin on the young girls' heads.

A neighbor came into the room, carrying a chi from whose head blood was flowing freely. The was not dangerous. It had no terror for the skil nurse. Leaving her companion to attend to the woman, this girl took the child from the distract mother, and in a few minutes had the wound bound and the child sobbing contentedly in her arms.

The nurses are allowed to select their own cases, to great extent. In typhoid cases, where constant care needed, two nurses are sometimes assigned to a patie so that they may relieve each other, and never, even a moment, leave the patient alone. Physicians who ha assisted the girls with lectures are desirous of seei the movement extended to other cities.

THE SEAMEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION

JACK'S LIGHT ASHORE

THE SEAMEN'S HOPE CIRCLE..

THE fourteenth anniversary of the Seamen's Christian Association, 399 West street, New York, marks a milestone of steady progress.

THE SHIPPING BUREAU

Readers of this journal are familiar with the history of this organization, and are aware that from its earliest inception its one aim has been to promote the well-being, spiritual and physical, of seafaring men ashore, by surrounding them with uplifting influences and safeguarding them in every way from the temptations abounding in the neighborhood. From 8 A.M. to 10 P.M., the hospitable reading and recreation room is open to sailors, who are welcomed by the Seamen's Hope Circle.

The Free Shipping Bureau has been very successfully managed, and it meets the hearty endorsement of the trans-Atlantic liners, which make use of its services to supply vacancies in their crews. Through this bureau hundreds of sailors out of employment have found occupation; there is an agent in charge day and night. The notice that a certain number of firemen or stokers are wanted, which often appears on the walls of the reading-room, is as cheerful a message as a seaman out of work could wish to see. Last year, places were found for 704 seamen; each was sent forth with kindly words. Aggregate attendance on services in the mission room during the same period was 53,464; 434 temperance pledges were signed; 1,632 meals were furnished at the mission; 642 lodgings were given. Through the banking system, over $17,000 was sent home by seamen to their families; this last feature of the institution is one of its most useful: all the world knows how Jack is robbed by land-sharks, and how when he gets ashore, it seems as if he c not but throw his money away, even thou his distant dear ones or himself may be sore need; the mission workers seek encourage his reform in this respect a take all pains to protect his interests fr those who would betray him. The gre need of the work is a Sailors' Home Christian dwelling, where seamen can safely and decently lodged when asho Some money has been raised to this e but not enough; $3,000 was the result a concert in which the musicians the big liners took part out of rega for the work the mission has done seamen. The Marine Superint dent of the White Star Line wr the Association: "I can testify your excellent work for seamen, a I trust the day is not far distant wh your Home will be opened." T Purser of the Teutonic said: "W want more of this Christ-like effort do good." The last moment bef sailing, if we want a man, we can g one fit at your mission," report Robert Nicol, Master. The co mander of the Oceanic testifie "The influence of the mission counts in part for the good cond of our men in port." Pastors a temperance workers commend Letters from seamen's wives a mothers, living in distant lands, press gratitude for kindness to lov ones. Miss Emma Bangs, the S retary, will answer questions ab the work, that may be sent to her 399 West street, New York City.

FINLAND STILL IN FAMINE'S GRASP

THE NATION GRATEFUL FOR AMERICA'S AID—OUR RELIEF EXPEDITION CROSSES TO SWEDEN

THE FINNISH CENTRAL RELIEF COMMITTEE AND THEIR AMERICAN GUESTS

1. Dr. Saltzman, Chairman. 2. Dr. Klopsch. 3. Mr. Gilson Willets. All the members of the Committee appear in the photograph

(Special Cable Dispatch to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD)

HAPARANDA, SWEDEN, MARCH 17.

Dr. Klopsch, with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Finland Relief Expedition, to-day crossed the Swedish frontier from Tornea, Finland, to this place, having driven from Uleaborg by sledges.

Throughout the entire journey of the expedition, from Helsingfors to Tornea on the Finnish boundary line, its progress was marked by extraordinary popular demonstrations, the people welcoming the travelers with song, oratory, poetry, and tributes of beautiful flowers, to express their heartfelt appreciation of the generosity of the American people, in helping Finland in her time of need.

At Tornea, their arrival was made the occasion of a public holiday. All the schools were closed, and the whole populace gathered at the City Hall and enthusiastically welcomed the expedition. In the party with Dr. Louis Klopsch were Gilson Willets, of New York; Professor Julio Reuter, of Helsingfors University, and Robert Alopaens, Superintendent of the Government Industrial Schools at Haparanda. The Mayor of Tornea, members of the clergy, and Government representatives welcomed the party to Sweden.

In three weeks, the expedition has traversed the greater part of northern Finland by sledges, including Kuopio, Idensalmi, Kajana, Suomussalmi, and practically every important centre of distress north and east of Helsingfors, being the first party of Americans who have ever journeyed through northern or eastern Finland in winter.

Notwithstanding official claims that the situation is well in hand, the expedition reports that the famine throughout Finland is gradually increasing in intensity and extent. Present conditions fully corroborate all previously published accounts. Even as far south as the sixty-second degree, at Idensalmi, the most appalling conditions prevail. Hundreds of children are begging bread from house to house. Scarlet fever and measles are epidemic. Eight hundred deaths have occurred in the district.

A single church parish reports that five thousand are absolutely destitute, and have been subsisting solely on "hunger-bread" since October. Meat, milk and potatoes are utterly lacking throughout the whole famine area. Thousands are barefooted and clothed in rags, while the ground is covered by deep snow. The suffering and want are beyond description.

In the Kajani and Uleaborg districts, the conditions are worst of all.

At least one hundred thousand Finlanders are wholly dependent on relief at the present moment. Half the cattle are dead, and the reports of human deaths by starvation are persistent.

The American contributions, exceeding $125,000, have unquestionably averted a large mortality.

The worst will come in April and May, when the spring thaws will render many of the sufferers inaccessible, even by snowshoes.

Finland's gratitude for American help is universal.

THE JOURNEY TO FINLAND

r. Willets Relates the Story of the Relief Expedition

OUR readers, who have so nobly helped the stricken Finns, will be interested in the following narrative of the journey of Dr. Klopsch and his fellow-traveler Mr. Gilson Willets:

Their voyage across the Atlantic, in the new Hamurg liner, Bluecher, was uneventful. On touching at ymouth at daylight, Monday, Feb. 16, a cable mesge from Stockholm was received, urging Dr. Klopsch visit the Swedish capital, but the first duty was to nland. Hamburg was reached on Feb. 18. In Ber-, Dr. Klopsch met Mr. Wile, the correspondent of e Chicago News, who had just returned from a long urney through the famine districts of Sweden. He us invited to address the American Women's Club of erlin on the Swedish famine. Dr. Klopsch was pres- t by invitation of the American Consul (whose wife President of the Club), and his presence becoming own to the audience, he was asked to speak, and mplied briefly. Several speakers referred with warm approval to the generosity of the readers of this journal in aiding the stricken people of the Northland.

Owing to the condition of the ice in the Gulf of Finland, interrupting navigation, it became necessary for Dr. Klopsch to proceed to Helsingfors by rail, via Russia. The journey from Berlin to St. Petersburg vividly recalled to Dr. Klopsch the remembrance of a similar journey in 1892, when, with the late Dr. Talmage, he went to Russia to visit the famine provinces, the steamship Leo, loaded with breadstuffs, medicines, and delicacies, the gift of Christian America, having already preceded him.

Across Russia's Frontier

Russia's frontier was reached Feb. 22, and after the usual inspection of passports and baggage, the travelers proceeded. They were now sensible of the increasing cold. They sped through the Czar's territory in a Russian train, and after a few hours' sleep awoke in the morning in a land of snow, ice, and penetrating temperature. Mr. Willets writes:

Many of the farmers along the line of railway earn their living in winter by preparing hemp and flax for market, and selling it at the railway stations to traveling agents. Others are occupied in hauling wood by sledge to the line. Farm-yards and out buildings are grouped closely together and enclosed, in order to be more accessible when the snows are deep.

Each stop at a Russian railway station proved colder than the preceding one; snow became more plentiful and people were more wrapped up in furs.

On Monday, February 23, the travelers reached St. Petersburg.

We were told that the Hotel Europe was full and a room to be had. Nevertheless we always there [illegible]. This was the only time we rode in a wheeled vehicle in Petersburg. All the rest of the time we sped along over the snow in sledges. At the station there were fifty or more of the sledges in a row. All were very small and low and [illegible] strange to Western eyes. They say the sleds are made small so that two riding together must necessarily sit closely [illegible].

During his stay in St. Petersburg, Dr. Klopsch had the pleasure of renewing acquaintance with Count Andre Bobrinskoy, of the imperial staff, who rendered excellent service to the American relief work during the Russian famine of 1892. He also had the honor of

A Far-Reaching Work

EVERY one of our readers who is supporting an orphan child in India is entitled to share in the gratification produced by a letter just received from Rev. A. E. Ayers, Methodist Episcopal Missionary at Baroda. In the orphanage under the care of Mr. Ayres, are over two hundred children, who are supported by readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. He is, therefore, in a position to estimate correctly the value and prospects of the work and to form a reliable judgment of the influence it is likely to have on the evangelization of India. Having been in contact with the children, having seen the effect on them of Christian training and education, he can speak with authority. He writes:

I wish to express my high appreciation of the great work THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is doing in India through these orphanages. It is a most extraordinary and remarkable work, and I want to say that as a missionary, and responsible to heaven for the very best investment of my life on earth, I covet no higher opportunity than the privilege of co-operating as I am, in this work which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is so nobly pushing and sustaining. My thought is that if it is projected into the future, by also taking up the maintenance of these same girls and boys, after they have become men and women, as Christian workers in this land, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers will have done, when the final account is rendered, one of the mightiest and most far-reaching tasks to be found in the whole missionary history of the world. REV. A. E. AYERS.

Baroda, India.

In various orphanages, of many denominations, in different parts of India, are children to the number of five thousand five hundred, each of whom, bereft of parents, is being fed, clothed and educated at the expense of some reader of this journal. In some instances it is an individual, in others a Sunday School, or a young people's society, but in every case the funds are forthcoming, and the missionaries on their part are loyally fulfilling their duty to the children. These waifs, who might otherwise have been left to starve, or to go to moral ruin, are being brought up in Christian surroundings and under Christian influence. They know that the people in this country, whose adopted children they are, have incurred the expense from Christian motives, and have thus given practical proof of the beneficence of the Christian faith. What may be expected of them when, as men and women, they go forth into the world? The people who are supporting them have consecrated them to Christ by their prayers, and we are justified in believing that He, in whose name and in whose spirit the work is being done, will care for them and make them his own. It is impossible to estimate the extent of the influence they will exert on their countrymen. To every one who has had a share in this Christlike enterprise we offer sincere congratulations. They have sown the seed which will bring forth fruit that the Lord of the Harvest will gather into his garner in the day of his glory. If, as He said, a cup of cold water given in his name should surely bring its reward, how much more will the gifts and sacrifices made for his sake to these orphans bring a blessing to both givers and recipients?

Family Fealty

WHATEVER faults the head of the family may have, wife and children should not unveil them to the neighbors, nor proclaim them in the market-place. If the mother have her little failings of temper or attacks of nerves, the daughters should never reveal them, or comment upon them by word or look, especially to strangers. Should children have habits which need improvement, let the work of correction be done at home, but never let a syllable be spoken anywhere else about their bad manners or their lapses of conduct. Family fealty absolutely exacts the presentation to the world on the part of the family of a strongly united front, and the suspicion of disloyalty is a misfortune to be deprecated.

People who forget this often create misconceptions in the minds of their auditors, and leave most undesirable impressions there. Years afterwards, seeds sown in the merest thoughtlessness may spring up and bring forth evil fruit. The loyalty which is the obligation of the immediate family group should spread even further and pervade the various branches of kindred, so that the clan may feel the beating of a common pulse, and the kindred be welded together as a single integer, in the contacts and strifes of humanity.

Occasional frictions will occur in the most peaceful family circles, but beware of quarrels in the presence of guests or servants. The latter lose respect for employers who descend to fretfulness and recrimination; the former are extremely uncomfortable when their hosts are out of temper. Doubtless while human nature remains imperfect, even the most devoted friends and relatives will now and then disagree, but they should always do so behind closed doors.

The Message From Finland

THERE is a tragic significance in the cable message from Dr. Klopsch and his traveling companion, which appears on another page. It is the first message they have sent from Swedish territory, but it deals mainly with the famine in Finland. They have traveled many hundreds of miles in sledges across the bleak, snowy wastes, in a temperature far below zero, and have visited practically every centre of want and suffering in northeastern Finland. Their experience forces them to the conclusion that the famine, far from being under control, is increasing in intensity, and that the worst is yet to come.

Nothing can exceed the pathos of the description of famine conditions, as Dr. Klopsch found them. Hundreds of little children begging bread from house to house, ragged and shoeless, in the arctic midwinter! Fever on every hand, in the lone Finnish villages, laying low the strongest and the weakest. Eight hundred dead in a single district. In another, five thousand living on tree-bark and spoiled rye, ever since last October. One hundred thousand men, women and children, foodless, and wholly dependent upon charity. A picture to shock Europe, and to excite the sympathies of the whole world!

This cable message makes it quite clear that America's work of rescue in Finland is not yet finished. Not until the permanent relief promised by Russia actually arrives, should our energies in behalf of the patient, uncomplaining Finnish peasants be relaxed. Now that the relief work is so thoroughly organized that it reaches to every centre of suffering, the task of sustaining the lives and the hopes of the stricken, until the spring thaws are past, will be greatly simplified. It needs only the generous co-operation of God's people, here and elsewhere, to make the rescue complete.

Among the Workers

—LAPEER, MICH., has been the scene of a notable revival. Dr. Smiley and his gospel singers spent a week there, holding meetings in the First Presbyterian Church (Rev. J. D. McDonald, pastor). 180 are reported as having confessed Christ.

—CROSSLEY AND HUNTER, the Canadian evangelists, have just closed a union campaign in Kingston, Ont., in which between 700 and 800 publicly enlisted for Christ. These brethren are now in Bradford, Pa., in a union between the Presbyterians, Methodists and Baptists.

—OVER FOUR thousand men arose for prayer, or otherwise expressed a desire to begin a Christian life, in the twenty-two meetings held for men recently, conducted by Rev. S. Edward Young in the Bijou Theatre, Pittsburg. It is believed that the total attendance was nearly 80,000, Pastor Young is corresponding with ministers and workers in various cities concerning the inauguration of similar meetings elsewhere.

—REV. M. S. REES, of Rochester, N.Y., recently held a two-weeks' series of meetings in Central M. E. Church, Wilkesbarre, Pa. The attendance was large and the interest great. There were more than one hundred and fifty seekers. Central Church will have over one hundred accessions, about one-half men, others going to churches in and out of the city. This is the third time that Mr. Rees has worked successfully with the pastor of this church, the Rev. C. E. Mogg.

—DR. FRANCIS E. SMILEY began a religious campaign, which has resulted in a revival, in Traverse City, Mich., with the united churches on Jan. 20. On a recent night, 1,600 people packed the largest opera house. Business houses closed during the mass meetings, and the town had the appearance of a Sunday. The mills and factories shut down before noon. There were fifty cottage meetings, and almost continuous services during the day. Many men, women and children are enrolled as converts.

—A REVIVAL is reported from the New Mexico Penitentiary at Santa Fe. Corresponding Secretary Joseph W. Looper, of the Prison Christian Endeavor, writes: "God has placed in our midst good Christian women—Mrs. J. E. Wood, Miss Edna E. Berger (our president), and Miss Ava Glidden. Many prisoners have found the cross and the meek and lowly Jesus, in the Christian Endeavor Society organized here. Mr. H. O. Bursum, warden, W. E. Martin, assistant, W. D. Newcomb, clerk, aid in this grand and noble work. We ask the prayers of your readers."

Reaching Helsingfors

Helsingfors was reached by rail on the morning Feb. 26. Mr. Willets thus describes the Finnish capita

The city, as you see on the map, is not north, but rath west, of St. Petersburg. We looked for much colder weath than in St. Petersburg, but found it not so cold as it usual is here at this season. We will get the really cold weath north of here. There is snow everywhere, and all traffic by sled in the city. The harbor ice is six feet deep. It is amazingly modern city, with trolleys, a hotel appointed well as the best in the United States, modern building electric lights, four newspapers, and a university with an e rollment as large as that of Yale.

On the evening of our arrival, Dr. Saltzman, Chairman the Finnish Relief Committee, called on Dr. Klopsch. Saltzman is of the highest standing as a citizen; indeed the members of the committee are of the first repute in th community.

Our travelers were entertained at dinner by Dr. Salt man next day, when a distinguished company was pre ent. Dr. Saltzman spoke in glowing terms of th philanthropic mission of Dr. Klopsch, who made suitable reply.

The following evening, the Finnish Central Relief Co mittee met to formally welcome Dr. Klopsch, who arrived the House of Representatives, where the meeting was held, eight o'clock. After several speeches had been made, Klopsch asked the committee various important questio relative to the famine and the relief work, the answers which will be transmitted to you when received.

Dr. Julio Reuter, of Helsingfors University (Profess of Sanskrit), was elected as a representative of the comm tee to accompany Dr. Klopsch on his tour through t famine districts. The meeting was most decorous and ord ly throughout. The members expressed the highest app ciation of the work of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and of t contributions of the American people to the relief ca They also thanked Dr. Klopsch for his visit in behalf of t American contributors.

Throughout our stay in Helsingfors, the distress in F land, individual and en masse, has been impressed upon us every conceivable way. As many as 150 persons have call during a single day, either to ask aid or to thank Dr. Klops for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S work. He, of course, co not see them all, and was obliged to refer them to the C tral Committee. The callers and letter-writers included r resentatives and delegations from many different organi tions, from workingmen's clubs to singing societies.

Dr. Klopsch has obtained much useful information fr the members of the Salvation Army. There, as elsewhe the Army is doing a practical work close to the core of d tress.

Off for the Frozen North

We leave Helsingfors, Tuesday evening, March 3, for t North, including in our route Kuopio, Idensalmi, Kaja Uleaborg, Kemi, thence to Torneo around the Gulf of Bo nia to Leslev in Sweden, and thence through the Swed famine area to Stockholm. We have much traveling now do in sleds, and under conditions akin to those of an expl ing party. We are obliged to leave our baggage, and to ta a small compact clothing outfit and food supplies before sta ing.

Here we leave comfort to begin the real hardship, and face the Arctic winds and temperature of the icy North GILSON WILLETS

The Famine in Sweden

Fenton MacPherson, of London, who has recen made a tour of the famine districts of Sweden, wri that the population has now suffered in silence nearly six months. In the far north, the disaster h been most overwhelming. It began with last autun when famine appeared in Norbottens Lan, Swede most northerly province. The people there, are, as rule, deeply religious, and the Bible is their mainst Private help was sent from various quarters, and people were barely kept alive, but the supplies w soon exhausted, and death by starvation stared people in the face.

Gradually the famine in Sweden has swept down fr the north to within 200 miles of Stockholm, the capi It is now almost general over a very large section the country. Dr. Klopsch, on reaching Stockholm, confer with the Relief Committee. The Swedish p ple have urgently appealed to American sympathy.

Contributions in aid of both Finland and Swed may be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible Hou New York, to be forwarded to the committees at H singfors and Stockholm. Contributors should st clearly for which country the contributions are intend All gifts will be duly acknowledged in the columns THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

A Notable Centenary

WITH appropriate exercises, in which many men of world-wide fame participated, the British and Foreign Bible Society celebrated, a few days ago, its entrance on the one hundredth year of its useful career. It is intended to make this year a banner year in its history, by raising a fund of 250,000 guineas ($1,312,500), to extend the work of Society. It was stated at the meetings, that in the rse of its life, the Society has issued over one hun- d and eighty million copies of the Scriptures, the put last year being over five millions. There is no eign missionary society in the world that has not n at some time indebted to the British and Foreign le Society, and it is its proud boast that it has er received from any people a request that it give m the Bible in their own tongue, that has been re- ed. It has now the plates for printing the Bible in languages and dialects, in each of which a supply come from its presses. It has also printed portions he Bible in thirty-three other languages, so that there now scarcely a people on earth altogether without Bible in its own tongue. No wonder that Pope Pius I. declared that the Society "is a plague to Christen- m," and that Pope Pius IX. publicly endorsed the nion. A work so extensive has been done that it has ie far to fulfil the resolve of William Tyndale, who, en threatened by the Pope's representative for is- ng the Bible in the English language, said, "If God res my life, I will cause the ploughboy to know re of the Scriptures than the priest."

t was on December 7, 1802, that the idea of the So ty was first broached. A meeting of the Religious act Society was being held in the offices of Mr. eph Hardcastle, a London merchant who, as the ciety had no home, placed the parlor of his ware- se (a picture of which as it now appears is here given) ts disposal. After the conclusion of the business, a elsh minister, Rev. Thomas Charles, whose portrait ears on this page, spoke on the destitution of Bibles re was in Wales. He quoted an incident of a Welsh l who, for several years, walked a distance of seven es every week to hear a chapter of the Bible read. nnah More, too, said that she and her sister had isvassed every house in a district of two thousand in- bitants, and had found only one house in which there s a Bible, and in that one it was being used to prop a flower-pot.

Mr. Charles proposed that a society be organized for sole purpose of promoting the circulation of the riptures. The proposal was accepted, and one of the nisters present was appointed to embody the general ling in a paper entitled, "The Excellence of the Holy riptures, an Argument for their more General Dis- sion at Home and Abroad," having for its prophetic tto the words: "Let us be the first institution t ever emanated from one of the nations of Europe the express purpose of doing good to all the rest." at was a period of slow communication, and there re many influential persons whose support it was sirable to enlist. It was not until March, 1804, that Society was organized. Lord Teignmouth was its t chairman, and for thirty years he gave it devoted vice. He was succeeded by Lord Bexley, who held office for seventeen years, and he by the Earl of aftesbury, who was chairman for thirty-four years. e Earl of Harrowby followed, and when he died, ee years ago, he was succeeded by the Marquis of rthampton, who is now in office. There has been no se in the Society's growth, and it has aided in estab- ing similar societies in other lands, notably the erican Bible Society, organized in 1816, which are operating in the work it initiated. To the efforts of se societies in disseminating the sacred volume we may attribute, by God's grace, in no small degree the advance of religion in the world.

So mightily grew the word of God and prevailed (Acts 19: 20).

Testamentary Avowals

In recalling the curious wills which have at various times been presented for probate, a newspaper writer mentions the following: After disposing of his property, the testator wrote: "At my death I wish to be cremated, and my ashes put into the earth enclosed in nothing. 'Earth to earth, ashes to ashes,' in any spot which is most convenient that I have loved. I particularly request that no Christian mummeries or tomfooleries be performed over my grave, but that I be buried as a secularist and agnostic. If it will comfort any one, there are plenty of those of my own friends who would come to say a few words of common sense. Over the spot where my ashes may lie, place no monument or stone. It is not necessary or required, nor is a procession, as the ashes can be carried in one person's hand. They can be buried in any place where the stars shall ever shed their light, and the sun shall gild each rising morn." Perhaps it was best that over the remains of a man capable of writing such words, there should be no religious service. When a man deliberately spurns the good that God has provided for his spiritual development, he voluntarily degrades himself to the condition which the Preacher described:

I said in my heart concerning the estate of the sons of men, that God might manifest them and that they might see that they themselves are beasts; as the one dieth, so dieth the other (Eccles. 3: 18).

Self-Sacrifice in Death

One of the most pathetic stories in the history of medical science, is related by a physician of New Orleans. It is that of a practitioner in Vienna, who had been experimenting to find a remedy for the Bubonic plague, which has worked such awful havoc in India during the past six years. Dr. Franz Mueller, a young man on the threshold of a brilliant scientific career, devoted himself to the discovery of a remedy for it. In the course of his study, he contracted the malady from the bacilli in "culture tubes," and when he became certain that he was infected, he immediately locked himself in an isolated room and posted a message on the window pane, reading thus: "I am suffering from plague. Please do not send a doctor to me, as, in any event, my end will come in four or five days." A number of his associates were anxious to attend him, but he refused to admit them, and died alone, within the time he predicted. He wrote a farewell letter to his parents, placed it against the window, so it could be read from the outside, and then burned the original with his own hands, feared it might be preserved and carry out the mysterious germ. Seldom has any one displayed so much concern for the safety of others, as to deliberately renounce the comforts of friendly ministration in the last crisis of life, lest loved ones might suffer. We can admire such self sacrifice even though we listen unmoved to the infinitely greater example of that spirit in Him who gave his life to save our souls from death.

He saved others; himself he cannot save (Matt. 27: 42).

Repudiating an Offer

A man who ventured his life to save a lady from drowning has been suing her husband in a court in Indiana, to recover the reward which he offered while his wife was in peril, to her rescuer. The lady, with her husband, a wealthy farmer, was crossing a bridge during a flood, when the structure collapsed and they fell into the river. The farmer was able to swim to the bank, but his wife was carried down the stream. Her course, however, was arrested by a tree, in the branches of which her skirts became entangled. Her situation was full of peril, and her husband ran along the shore in great distress, calling for help and offering a thousand dollars for her rescue. A man who heard the offer ventured out and brought the lady ashore. He demanded the reward, but the husband demurred. He said he had made the offer under temporary excitement, and it was much too large a sum to pay for the service rendered. The jury, however, after hearing the case, determined otherwise, and gave the rescuer the amount offered by the husband. The decision was just. A promise so made ought to be kept; but how many are broken! How few there are who fulfil the pledges made on a sickbed or under the dread of some impending calamity!

A Caution to Medical Men

The present tendency to send consumptive patients to the mountains is liable, it appears, to work disastrously in some cases. Writing in a medical journal, a well-known physician says: "The experiment is dangerous in all cases in which the patient has any disease of the heart, or has a weak heart. It is especially the rapidity of the change from one altitude to another, with differences of from three to four thousand feet, which must be considered. There is a call made on the contractibility of the small arteries on the one hand, and on the amount of muscular force of the heart on the other hand, and if the structures in question cannot respond to this call, rupture of an artery or dilation of the heart may ensue. In the case of a normal condition of the circulatory organs little harm is done beyond some transient discomfort, such as dizziness, buzzing in the ears, palpitation, general malaise and this often only in the case of people totally unaccustomed to high altitudes." The physician cites several instances of death occurring through the removal of patients to higher ground. Happily there is no such danger in the condition of the soul.

If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God (Col. 3: 1).

BRIEF NOTES

The Maine Legislature has defeated another attempt to repeal the prohibitory amendment.

The new President of the American Bible Society is Dr. Daniel C. Gilman, who was for many years President of Johns Hopkins University. Dr. Gilman is a brother of Dr. Edward W. Gilman, who was chief secretary of the American Bible Society for more than thirty years.

THE CONQUEST OF DEATH ❋ The Resurrection

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR APRIL 12
EASTER SUNDAY. I. CORINTHIANS 15: 20, 21, 50-58

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT: NOW IS CHRIST RISEN FROM THE DEAD, AND BECOME THE FIRST FRUITS OF THEM THAT SLEPT. I. COR. 15: 20.

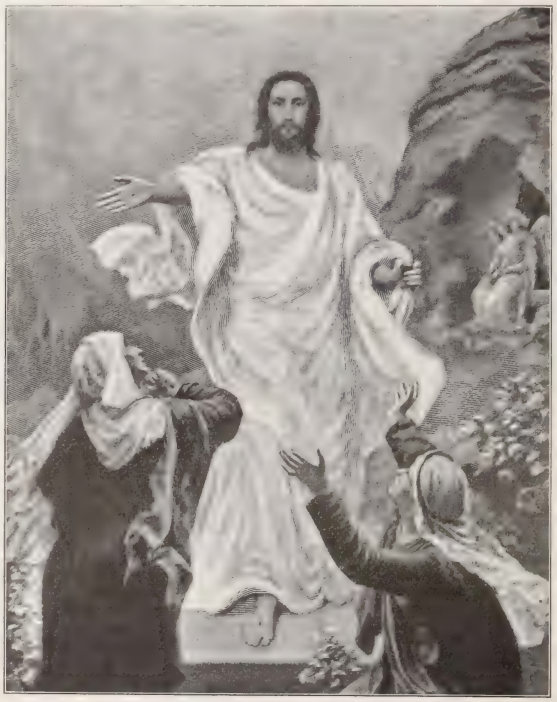
IN the church that Paul planted at Corinth, some denied the resurrection of the dead. For them and for all who have doubts on this great subject, this chapter of logic on fire was written. No other chapter has been read so often at funerals, to assure the bereaved that death is not the end of life and love. Paul's order of thought and argument is: I. Christ rose, of which there are abundant proofs, v. 1-8. II. Christians are so united to Christ that his resurrection is the promise and precursor of their resurrection, v. 12-34. III. Objections to the resurrection answered, v. 35-58.

Now hath Christ been raised from the dead. Let us recall the events of that first Easter, which was also the first "Lord's Day."

"While it was yet dark" on that first Easter morn, an angel, heralded by an earthquake, sped to the sealed tomb of Christ and rolled away the stone. "His appearance was as lightning, and his raiment white as snow; and for fear of him the watchers did quake, and became as dead men." He who had laid down his life, took it again and came forth. Shortly after this, the Marys and other women, unmindful of the oft-repeated promise of Jesus that he would rise from the dead, which they doubtless thought was only a figure of speech, came to the sepulchre with spices to embalm his body, saying as they came, "Who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the sepulchre?" And when they looked, behold it was rolled away—not alone from Christ's tomb, but from every Christian tomb to the end of time. The Marys hastened to tell Peter and John that the body of Jesus had been removed, but this news was not heeded, for these apostles thought the women had been deceived. The Marys, however, returned to the tomb and went in. The body of Jesus was not to be found, but an angel, looking like a young man, in white, was met in the tomb, who said, "Ye seek Jesus—he is risen, as he said unto you." Again they told Peter and John what they had seen, and this time these apostles raced to the tomb, John outstripping Peter, but Peter was first to go in. "Then went in also that other disciple," a suggestive example of unconscious influence. They found in the tomb only the folded grave clothes that Christ had left behind, and shortly went away. Mary Magdalene, however, lingered by the tomb. She looked in and saw two angels, one at the head and the other at the foot, where the body of Jesus had lain—angels of Memory and Hope, perhaps—who said, "Woman, why weepest thou?" She answered, "Because they have taken away my Lord." Just then she heard a step behind her, and turned. It was Jesus, but she thought it was the gardener, and said, reproachfully, "Tell me where thou hast laid him." Jesus said, "Mary," and she answered, "Rabboni—O my Master." While they talked, the other women returned, and Jesus said, "Go tell my brethren," but when the women reported to them that Jesus had been alive, the apostles thought it too good to be true.

Meantime the fear stricken guards had fled to the city, and had told their story to the crucifiers of Jesus, who bribed them to say that while they slept beside the tomb, the body of Jesus had been stolen away.

In the afternoon of that first Easter, two disciples were walking to Emmaus, a nearby village. One was Cleopas, the other is not named. Perhaps it was Luke. Jesus walked with them, at first unrecognized, but at last revealed in the breaking of bread. Those disciples, to whom Jesus was made known at Emmaus, hastened back to Jerusalem and told the apostles, whom they found gathered in the upper room where they were wont to meet, that Jesus was risen indeed. And even as they spake, Jesus suddenly appeared, despite the closed doors, and said to them in their agitation, "See my hands and feet, that it is I myself." And then he ate with them, and explained the prophecies he was fulfilling. He bade them tarry in Jerusalem for the Holy Spirit, and then go forth as witnesses of the Cross and resurrection and the way of salvation to all nations. As a foretaste of the Pentecost to come, he said, "Receive ye the Holy Spirit." And so ended the first Easter Sunday, with all the doubting apostles assured, save only Thomas, who had a sad week of continued doubts, because he missed that Easter evening service. Not one of Jesus' friends, when the day began, expected his return, but when the day was ended they had become convinced that Christ had conquered death.



"BEHOLD, JESUS MET THEM, SAYING, ALL HAIL"

Illustration and Application

The Gospels give the history of the resurrection; Paul adds the philosophy of history, as we should always look for the meaning of facts and events. Paul used the resurrection, first, to prove the divinity of Christ as Lord of life and death; second, to show his humanity, and the consequent resurrection of Christians, who become by faith one with him; for the wicked there is a resurrection unto death, a deathless death; third, to incite men to newness of life this side the grave, a rising out of death like selfishness into a Christ-like life.

The first fruits of them that are asleep. There are two beautiful pictures in these eight words. Death is compared to sleep, in which we get rest and renewed strength in preparation for a new day beyond the night. And Christ's resurrection is spoken of as the "first fruits," given to God, of a world harvest of resurrections, in which all who are identified with Christ are to come to a like harvest-home of golden immortality. Dean Farrar tells of a boy who took a flower with him every morning, and laid it on his school desk, to remind him of God, and so displace evil thoughts. Every plant of springtime or harvest should remind us of God's presence and power, and especially should assure us at Easter that he who can bring living beauty and rich fruitage out of a buried seed, which decays, but rises in a new body of more abundant life, can bring us through death to life. In man, "the identity that survives death is not one of particles, but of personality" (v. 44).

For since by man came death. The argument here is for Christians only, that as by their natural connection with Adam, they must die, so by their spiritual connection with Christ, they will rise from the dead.

We shall all be changed. Paul here teaches that even those who are alive at the final glorious appearing of Christ must be changed into spiritual bodies, corresponding to the resurrection bodies of those who die, since flesh and blood cannot enter the perfected life of heaven. In the presence of the multitudinous resurrections of spring, when the homely bulb is rising into the beautiful lily, and the worm is rising into the broader life of the butterfly, surely no one can say that the resurrection body is contrary to the analogies of nature. Archbishop Whately, shortly before he died, hearing some one read Philippians 3: 21, "who shall change our vile body," stopped the reader to protest that the word was not rightly translated. He gave the translation since adopted for the Revision, "the body of our humiliation," saying earnestly, "Nothing that God made is 'vile.'"

Dr. Maltbie D. Babcock found resurrection voices in the clouds: "What Shelley wrote of his cloud each of us may say in the same spirit to his soul:

> I am the daughter of earth and water,
> And the nursling of the sky.
> I pass through the pores of ocean and shores,
> I change, but I never die.
> For after the rain, when, with never a stain,
> The pavilion of heaven is bare,
> And the clouds and sunbeams, with their convex gleams,
> Build up the blue dome of air,
> I silently laugh at my own cenotaph,
> And out of the cavern of rain,
> Like a child from the womb, like a ghost from the tomb,
> I arise, and upbuild again.

"Without a Bible, I should believe in my surviving life, though everything about me pass away."

Paul's pæan of triumph over death is a burst of rhythmic prose:

> Where, O Death, is thy victory?
> Where, O Death, thy sting?
> Now the sting of Death is Sin, and the strength of Sin is the Law;
> But to God be thanks who gives to us the victory
> Through our Lord Jesus Christ.

Dr. Joseph Parker, in a poem prompted by this chapter, exclaims:

> "O Death!
> I would that thou wert dead." Then Death answered me.
> His voice was gentle, and through all his pallor
> There gleamed the outline of a smile. I saw > Transfigured Death.
> "I am God's servant. The flock must be brought home.
> I go to bring the wanderers to the fold.
> The lambs are God's, not yours; or yours but to > Watch and tend until he sends for them.
> Through your own fatherhood read God's heart.
> Through your own watching for the child's return
> Conceive the thought that glows in love divine."

Another poet has sung in the same key:

> We asked an earthly thing of Thee, O, Lord,
> That night in our hour of dread;
> But the Lord God answered all our prayers
> With a heavenly thing instead.

Therefore be steadfast, always abounding in the work of the Lord. . . . Now concerning the collection upon the first day of the week. Paul will not allow thoughts of death to lead to idle brooding, but makes his resurrection song a call to better living and nobler giving, here and now. The chapter division hides in part the application Paul makes, that as Jesus completed his life of self-giving on the first day of the week, the resurrection, so we who claim to have his spirit and bear his name, should regularly on that day give of our substance to the cause for which Christ died. The weekly Lord's Day should be a weekly reminder of the resurrection of Christ, which it celebrates. To rise out of the death of selfishness into spiritual life is the best Sabbath observance. To keep the Lord's Day is to acknowledge the Lordship of Christ over death and life, over time and eternity. To desecrate the Lord's Day is to trample on the sign, the ensign of his supreme government, an offense kindred to treason. This part of the resurrection message should not be overlooked in too absorbing thoughts of death, for the best way to rob death of its terrors is to live aright, and the Lord's Day is the rudder of the week, whose good or evil use turns it all to the right or to the wrong. And this is the very season to fortify against the summer temptations to this sin, which men count trivial, but which God forbade in his longest commandment, and disapproves by linking the day with the great of miracles, the resurrection of Christ.

Three children brought gifts for a hospital. One brought a costly present for which his father had paid; and that did not count as a gift from the child. Another brought several toys which she did not use or care for; and that present did not count as from the child. A third, a poor boy, brought a plant which he had been wanting for a long time, and had been saving his pennies to buy. He was the only one that really gave the hospital anything.

> Behold us, the rich and the poor.
> Dear Lord, in thy service draw near;
> One consecrateth a precious coin,
> One droppeth only a tear;
> Look, Master, the love is here!
> —CHRISTINA G. ROSSETTI.

God established the Christian Sabbath, first for rest; second, for worship; third, for doing good; fourth, for training in unselfishness, in order to which we must give up selfish pleasure as well as selfish work (Isa. 58: 13, 14).

If ye then were raised together with Christ, seek things that are above (Col. 3: 1). That is the climax of all Paul's reasoning about the resurrection. He describes a whole life of Christ in the soul. Its Bethlehem is in the words, "I travail in birth again till Christ be formed in you" (Gal. 4: 19). Its transfiguration is in the words, "Be not conformed to the world, but be ye transfigured by the renewing of your mind" (Rom. 12: 2). Its crucifixion is in the words, "Crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live, yet not I—Christ liveth in me" (Gal. 2: 20). Its Easter is in the words "Raised together with Christ, seek the things that are above," not as a future bliss, but as present power.

Gleanings

Not death but sin is most to be feared, and the only death worth fearing is that second death which is the wage of sin. Pension Commissioner Eugene T. Ware has put this into a quaint rhyme of sombre significance:

> If the wages of sin are death, I do not want to begin;
> If I can't get living wages, I will not work for sin.
> Then, again, if I went to work, and the work I didn't like
> After I'd passed a pay-day, I would find I couldn't strike.

A kind-hearted, sympathetic physician sat by the bedside of a young man to whom he had been summoned on a professional visit. After considering the patient's case, he frankly informed him that his time was short.

The invalid was alarmed. Looking up into the doctor's face with a despairing expression, he said, "I have missed it at last."

"What have you missed?" was the inquiry.

"I have missed it at last," he repeated. "Missed what?" "Doctor, I have missed the salvation of my soul." "Ah, sa not so; it is not so. Do you remember the thief on the cross?

"Yes, I remember the thief on the cross, and I remembe that he never said to the Holy Ghost, 'Go thy way,' but I die And now he is saying to me—Go thy way."

While lying there gasping, and looking with a vacant, star ing eye, he continued in substance, "I was awakened an anxious about my soul, but I did not then want to be saved Something seemed to say, 'Don't put it off; make sure o salvation.' I said to myself, 'I will postpone it,' and I did I have missed it at last." And so he died.

In contrast, let us set some of the many cases where Christians have faced death in the spirit of Paul's exclamation, "O Death, I will be thy death." A Christian woman was going cheerfully to prison as a martyr, when a bystander exclaimed "Oh, you have not yet tasted the bitterness of death." "No, she answered, "and never shall, for Christ has promised that his friends shall never see death."

"Over the Hills and Far Away"

WHEN spring comes dancing over the hills, and the little streams that were lately frozen go leaping and laughing in the sun, and the grass is green in a thousand meadows, and the birds sing again, how we long to be up and off, to go "over the hills and far away." Very likely we cannot obey that vagrant impulse. Duty binds us to the shop, and the office, and the kitchen. The same routine, familiar by repetition, day after day, month after month, and year after year, must be ours to the end. Yet do not fret, you whose lot it is to tarry by the stuff. Home ways and looks are very precious, and one never rests anywhere as in one's own bed at night.

An afternoon's outing, a ride on one's wheel, a ride in cable or trolley car, a visit to an old friend, and a cup of tea at her fireside, an hour in a library, a stroll in the park, a visit anywhere, just beyond the accustomed boundary of the day, may work re-creation for us, and do just as much good as would the longer recess. Over the hills, over the sea, over the continent, by all means, if one can, but if one cannot, then be content with a walk down the street, or an excursion to the next village.

Sometimes one is refreshed by moving into another room: changing the north room for the south, or down the stair for up the stair. If one cannot change at all, one can thank God for health, and courage, and feet, and hands, and a quiet mind. There is always blue sky somewhere, friends.

Mary's Engagement

When the first daughter to have a household is its eldest-born, the special joy of her father, and her mother's confidante and aid, there is not unmixed gladness in the parents' hearts. It is going to be lonesome without Mary. Father feels positively jealous of John. Why should this young fellow walk in and boldly make love to Mary? Nevertheless, Mary's mother was courted the same way, once upon a time, by a young man named John, and she said Yes—a long time ago. It has been a happy time since. Mary the second has a right to have her own home and a good husband. Nobody denies that.

How shall the engagement be announced? Well, Mary may do it herself if she likes, by having a little party and telling the girls. Or, she may write a few notes to her dearest friends. Or, her mother—and this is a very good plan—may mention the fact when she is writing to her friends, saying that the engagement is pleasing to Mary's family, and that they like the man she has chosen. If Mary is a popular girl, and the town is not a very large one, the news may slip into the papers. This is a kindly world, and a world that loves a lover; so, when the newspaper spreads the tidings, people who know neither Mary nor John, will feel an interest, and wish them both God-speed.

About Wearing Specs

"Where are my specs?" Grandpa is looking for them everywhere, in mother's room, on the mantel-piece, in the wood-shed, on the shelf where the clock ticks solemnly the long day through. "Hello!" cries little Tim, "your specs-acles are on your head, Grandpa," and so they are, resting benignly on the dear old fellow's shining bald pate. Grandpa is absent-minded and forgets easily, but he is good-natured and joins in the laugh against himself as if the incident were not one that happens every day.

The question which he puts so wistfully, I want to put, in another form, to you, my reader, "Where are your eye-glasses, please?" You fumble over your sewing and spots dance before your eyes. You bass and fidget to get the exact angle by lamp light where you can read the paper, and you affirm your belief that the print is poor. To remedy the trouble, you need artificial aid.

A timely visit to a good oculist may so relieve you, that the face of the world may be changed. Those weary, nervous headaches that are so irritating and so frequently recur, may disappear after you have been suited with the proper lens that will cure astigmatism or myopia. The latter word means short-sight, the former, unequal sight.

Please be advised in time, and even if you fancy that spectacles will rob you of some portion of good looks, never mind. To be able to look out on life in comfort, is much better than merely to be agreeable to look at in the eyes of others.

I have seen girls under thirty who had the eyes of seventy-five, literally, because vanity kept them from wearing spectacles. I ask again, Where are yours?

That Restless Child

"She wants to do everything herself. She thinks of so many things to do, that I get all tired out."

True, little mother, but don't repress that restless child. She has self-reliance. She has the power of initiative. Both are splendid qualities that will serve her well by and by.

THE SWEET O' THE YEAR

With the lambs in the meadow, the birds in the nest,
And the bloom on the bough, and the wind in the West,
Oh, lovely is earth, and our hearts leap to hear
The breeze in the grass in the sweet o' the year.

THE FIRST CROCUS

I knew you were coming
Though March winds were rough,
His bluster and fluster
Is only a bluff
For swift as he hurries
And scurries along,
He announces the entrance
Of birds in a throng.
And lo! in a twinkling upon his wild track,
There'll be perfume and bloom when
The flowers come back.

The Crying Need of Pockets

THE wind fairly howled around the corner day or two ago, and I, trying bravely along at both arms, caught a lady who was just coming through the door of the post office. She had pushed a money-order for a hundred million dollars, and the letter, safely deposited from the envelope, as she thought, were in her hand. But as a matter of fact, she had not. Pockets are not important enough in our experience. The lady clutched her skirts with very commendable hand already furnished with bag and umbrella. In the other hand was the precious little envelope, and such it, too, she stood to hold for me. A few words the gale blew off. Money flew away. The lady was not pleased the ladies as it did to those behind her. They, however, restrained herself had hard work to maintain a bearing. Tranquility was returned to the post with a no less rife for pocket, and she had to borrow car fare to ride home.

Women in countless instances, they never find their way into the papers, are robbed because they have no proper place in which to carry money. I have had one purse taken from my hand as I passed a street crossing, and have lost a long, the exact substitute for a pocket, as I passed through a crowd to the entrance to a theatre. One started to carry her money at home after having experienced, carrying with her only the necessary change.

There are however, occasions when a woman must carry her fifty dollars, as on the event of a country sale, or money is required, as in the case of the Washington ladies, when a check at monument must be cashed. Every woman who expects to carry money about, should provide herself with a snug, flat, little pocket in the front of her jacket, a pocket that may be buttoned up securely, and that cannot be rifled without her knowledge. A bag, or a purse, or an envelope in the hand is an unsecure device, a temptation to thieves, and possibly the sport of the wind. A pocket in the petticoat is, by old-fashioned ladies, supposed to be very safe, but one is by no means placed. An elbow and pocket by suggested to a street car has been known to rip an outside skirt with a pair of scissors, and clean all under and pocket-contents into the open space of the petticoat pocket. The best is far safer pocket in the skirt for a woman's [illegible] pocket.

But my friends, how many of us need pockets? Ladies have [illegible] pockets and pockets [illegible] pockets. I was [illegible] as old grew [illegible] to feel away in a fold of the lining, in a most inconvenient and inaccessible place. I came upon a pocket. The great discovery was made. The pocket was there. I had not supposed it was there. Until we [illegible] dresses with pockets there is fear of [illegible] at the very least. A need never disturb the [illegible] in the world of [illegible] over [illegible].

Absent-minded

"I am dreadfully absent-minded. It often makes me awkward and embarrassed." This statement is supposed to excuse preoccupation in society, absentness of manner, and numerous peculiarities which make people appear useless and put them out of the current of affairs. Now one has no right whatever to be absent minded. One's obligation is to be present minded, or, in other words, to give one's continuous attention to what other people are saying, and to whatever may be going on around one. To a very great portion of the second fit of absentness of mind may be excused, but so few of us are gifted with anything beyond mere talent, or a common knack, that we cannot shield ourselves behind that barricade. The point of the matter is, that whatever we are doing, and wherever we are going, and in whatever place we are, we must put ourselves into it, with our whole might and mind. Then, too, we shall go through life much safely, and with more ground immunity from accidents, if we know not were about us, and the mishaps that befall one being easily attributable to thoughts that are at the ends of the earth, when they ought to be in front of us, watching the cars at the corner, or the crowd, or the truck that is bearing down the street nearly to mark our ruin.

Don't be absent-minded on the road of life. The crowd is far too great, and the risks too many.

OUR SUNDAY HOUR WITH THE LITTLE FOLKS

CHILDREN, there are so many Puzzle Answers, and the careful reading of them requires so much time and pains, that the names of the prize-winners for March 4, are not ready as this issue goes to press. They will be given in the next; and in future, announcement of prize-winners will be made every fifth, instead of every fourth week from publication of competitions.

Believing that you are really more interested in the puzzles than in this little talk preceding it, you may perhaps be pleased hereafter should no preamble whatever be interposed between you and your puzzles.

COMPETITION 32

What two proper names of places mentioned in Scripture do these pictures represent?

Write "Competition 32" plainly across the top of a postal card or sheet of paper; next, your name, age and address; then the answers. For each of the two answers employ but one word—the proper name which you think the pictures represent. Don't quote Scripture passages; simply state the name. Below the answer, write, in not over twenty words, what, in your judgment, are the most important facts concerning the subject of the first of these pictures? Read the rules given below.

Competition 33

Curious Questions

1. When did men refuse the offer of cooked food, and insist on having it uncooked?
2. When did a man employ an article of common domestic use to commit a murder?
3. Mention the name of a man the sum of the letters of whose name, according to their value in the Roman notation, give the date of his death within ten years?
4. On what occasion did the hearers of a foreign speaker, who was addressing them in their own tongue, interrupt him with a request that he would use his own?

Write "Competition 33" plainly across the top of your postal card or sheet of paper; next, your name, age, and address. Answer as many of the questions as you can, writing in each case the number of the question (not the question itself) before its answer. Answers to all four questions must not exceed fifty words in the aggregate. Read the following rules.

RULES AND PRIZES

Contests are not open to competitors over fourteen years of age. Only one weekly competition is open to any one person. If you answer both Competition 32 and 33, you forfeit your chances therefor. Do not send two solutions. There is no objection to asking the help of others, but each competitor must send in the answers in his or her own handwriting. Should you use paper instead of a postal card, be sure to write on the envelope in which you enclose your answer "Competition 32," or "Competition 33," as the case may be. Write on one side of paper only.

All answers must be mailed not later than April 6. Address, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Little Folks' Department, Bible House, N. Y.

Prizes—For the best answer to Competition 32, a handsome silver watch, lady's or gentleman's. For the best answer to Competition 33, a handsome silver watch, lady's or gentleman's. For the next best answer from each State, territory and Canadian province sending meritorious responses to competitions, a beautiful book as consolation prize.

Names of Prize-Winners in Competition of March 4, will be Announced Next Week

A Singing Evangelist

SINCE October, Mrs. Grace Weiser Davis, of whose work readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are familiar, has been leading a remarkable series of revival meetings in Connecticut, Washington, D. C., Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Nyack, New York City and other places, witnessing, it is said, the conversion of some 1,500 souls, and the renewing of faith of many already church members. Among the interesting conversions may be mentioned that of a prosperous farmer on his seventieth birthday, after which he immediately began to lead others to Christ, among them his own son. At several places of great awakenings, there had been no revival for many years. The meetings at the old Seventh Street M. E. Church, New York, were of special interest; there were one hundred and fifty conversions. A number of gamblers, who were induced to hear Mrs. Davis, have been turned from their evil ways.

By singing the Gospel, as well as preaching it, by personal converse, by distribution of tracts, and any method that appeals to her, Mrs. Davis seeks to reach and to win the lost.

Through the generosity of Mr. Freeborn Garrettson Smith, of Brooklyn, the little sermon cards and other literature which she gives away, is supplied to her for that special purpose.

MY FRIEND

I MUST have Christ abide with me,
Amid life's changing scene;
He must my trusted Saviour be,
My friend on whom to lean.
I tell him when I have prevailed,
All I have meant to do,
And things wherein my hand has failed—
The hopes I still pursue.

I must have Christ abide with me,
He sympathizes so,
Responsive to my earnest plea,
My inmost thought to know.
Though other friends be loving—true—
As human friends can be,
They cannot help as he can do,
Nor give such peace to me.

Life has temptations—trials—woes—
And disappointments grim;
But all that comes my Saviour knows,
And I can trust in him.
He will not let grief's smiting touch
Be laid too hard on me;
Nor let care try me overmuch,
Nor sin my conqueror be.

His grace will be sufficient strength,
He will not let me fall;
And I through him shall be at length
A victor over all.
My ever-present Friend divine!
Oh, how can any live
Without this precious Friend of mine,
Who can such kindness give?

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

IN MISS VINY'S GARDEN*

"THAT'S exactly what ails her," agreed Mrs. Wiggs: "it's nerves, Miss Hazy. To my way of thinkin', nerves is worser than tumors an' cancers. Look at old Mrs. Schultz. She's got the dropsy so bad you can't tell whether she's settin' down or standin' up, yet she ain't got a nerve in her body, an' has 'most as good a time as other folks. We can't let Lovey Mary go on with these here nerves; no tellin' where they'll land her at. If it was jes springtime, I'd give her sulphur an' molasses an' jes a leetle cream of tartar; that, used along with egg-shell tea, is the outbeatenest tonic I ever seen. But I never would run ag'in' the seasons. Seems to me I've heard yallerroot spoke of fer killin' nerves."

"I don't 'spect we could git no yallerroot round here."

"What's the matter with Miss Viny? I bet it grows in her garden thick as hairs on a dog's back. Let's send Lovey Mary out there to git some, an' we'll jes repeat the dose on her till it takes some hold."

"I ain't puttin' much stock in Miss Viny," demurred Miss Hazy. "I've heared she was a novelist reader, an' she ain't even a church-member."

"An' do you set up to jedge her?" asked Mrs. Wiggs, in fine scorn. "Miss Viny's got more sense in her little finger than me an' you has got in our whole heads. She can doctor better with them yarbs of hers than any physicianner I know. As to her not bein' a member, she lives right an' helps other folks, an' that's more than lots of members does. Besides," she added conclusively, "Mr. Wiggs himself wasn't no church-member."

The following Sunday being decidedly cooler, Lovey Mary was started off to Miss Viny's in quest of yellowroot. She had protested that she was not sick, but Miss Hazy, backed by Mrs. Wiggs, had insisted.

"If you git down sick, it would be a' orful drain on me," was Miss Hazy's final argument, and the point was effective.

As Lovey Mary trudged along the railroad-tracks, she was unconscious of the pleasant changes of scenery. The cottages became less frequent, and the bare, dusty commons gave place to green fields. Here and there a tree spread its branches to the breezes, and now and then a snatch of bird song broke the stillness. But Lovey Mary kept gloomily on her way, her eyes fixed on the cross-ties. The thoughts surging through her brain were dark enough to obscure even the sunshine. For three nights she had cried herself to sleep, and the "nervous sensations" were getting worse instead of better.

"Just two months since Kate was hurt," she said to herself. "Soon as she gets out the hospital she'll be trying to find us again. I believe she was coming to the factory looking for me when she got run over. She'd just like to take Tommy away and send me to jail. Oh, I hate her worse all the time! I wish she was—"

The wish died on her lips, for she suddenly realized that it might already have been fulfilled. Some one coughed near by and she started guiltily.

"You seem to be in a right deep study," said a voice on the other side of the fence.

Lovey Mary glanced up and saw a queer-looking old woman smiling at her quizzically. A pair of keen eyes twinkled under bushy brows, and a fierce little beard bristled from her chin. When she smiled it made Lovey Mary think of a pebble dropped in a pool, for the wrinkles went rippling off from her mouth in ever-widening circles, until they were lost in the gray hair under her broad-brimmed hat.

"Are you Miss Viny?" asked Lovey Mary, glancing at the old-fashioned flower-garden beyond.

"Well, I been that fer sixty year'; I ain't heared of no change," answered the old lady.

"Miss Hazy sent me after some yellowroot," said Lovey Mary, listlessly.

"Who fer?"

"Me."

Miss Viny took a pair of large spectacles from her pocket, put them on the tip of her nose, and looked over them critically at Lovey Mary.

"Stick out yer tongue."

Lovey Mary obeyed.

"Uh-huh. It's a good thing I looked. You don't no more need yallerroot than a bumblebee. You come in here on the porch an' tell me what's ailin' you, an' I'll do my own prescriptin'."

Lovey Mary followed her up the narrow path, that ran between a mass of flowers. Snowy oleanders, yellow asters, and purple phlox crowded together in a space no larger than Miss Hazy's front yard. Lovey Mary forgot her troubles in sheer delight in seeing so many flowers together.

"Do you love em, too?" asked Miss Viny, jerking her thumb over her shoulder.

"I guess I would if I had the chance. I never saw them growing out of doors like this. I always had to look at them through the store windows."

"Oh, law, don't talk to me 'bout caged-up flowers! I don't b'lieve in shuttin' a flower up in a greenhouse any more'n I b'lieve in shuttin myself up in one church all the time."

Lovey Mary remembered what Miss Hazy had told her of Miss Viny's pernicious religious views, and she tried to change the subject. But Miss Viny was started upon a favorite theme and was not to be diverted.

"This here is a denominational garden, an' I got every congregation I ever heared of planted in it. I ain't got no faverite bed. I keer fer 'em all jes alike. When you come to think of it, the same rule holds good in startin' a garden as does in startin' a church. You first got to steddy what sort of soil you goin' to work with, then you have to sum up all the things you have to fight ag'inst. Next you choose what flowers are goin' to hold the best places. That's a mighty important question in churches, too, ain't it? Then you go to plantin', the thicker the better, fer in both you got to allow fer a mighty fallin' off. After that you must take good keer of what you got, an' be sure to plant something new each year. Once in a while some of the old growths has to be thinned out, and the new upstarts an' suckers has to be pulled up. Now, if you'll come out here I'll show you round."

She started down the path, and Lovey Mary, somewhat overwhelmed by this oration, followed obediently.

"These here are the Baptists," said Miss Viny, waving her hand toward a bed of heliotrope and flags. "They want lots of water; like to be wet clean through. They sorter set off to theyselves an' tend to their own business: don't keer much 'bout minglin' with the other flowers."

Lovey Mary did not understand very clearly what Miss Viny was talking about, but she was glad to follow her in the winding paths, where new beauties were waiting at every turn.

"These is geraniums, ain't they? One of the girls had one, once, in a flower-pot when she was sick."

"Yes," said Miss Viny; "they're Methodist. They like lots of encouragement in the way of sun an' water. These phlox are Methodist, too; no set color, easy to grow, hardy an' vigorous. Pinchin' an' cuttin' back the shoots makes it flower all the better; needs new soil every few years; now ain't that Methodist down to the ground?"

"Are there any Presbyterians?" asked Lovey Mary, beginning to grasp Miss Viny's meaning.

"Yes, indeed; they are a good, old, reliable bed. Look at all these roses an' tiger lilies an' dahlias: they all knew what they was goin' to be afore they started to grow. They was elected to it, an' they'll keep on being what they started out to be clean to the very end."

"I know about predestination," cried Lovey Mary, eagerly. "Miss Bell used to tell us all those things."

"Who did?"

Lovey Mary flushed crimson. "A lady I used to know," she said evasively.

Miss Viny crossed the garden, and stopped before a bed of stately lilies and azaleas. "These are 'Piscopals," she explained. "Ain't they tony? Jes look like they thought their bed was the only one in the garden. Somebody said that a lily didn't have no pore kin among the flowers. It ain't no wonder they 'most die of dignity. They're like the 'Piscopals in more ways 'n one; both hates to be disturbed, both likes some shade, an' "—confidentially—"both air pretty pernickity. But to tell you the truth, ain't nothin' kin touch 'em when it comes to beauty! I think all the other beds is proud of 'em, if you'd come to look into it. Why, look at weddin's an' funerals! Don't all the churches call in the 'Piscopals an' the lilies on both them occasions?"

Lovey Mary nodded vaguely.

"An' here," continued Miss Viny, "are the Unitarians. You may be s'prised at me fer havin' 'em in here, 'long with the orthodox churches; but if the sun an' the rain don't make no distinction, I don't see what right I got to put 'em on the other side of the fence. These first is sweet-william, as rich in bloom as the Unitarian is in good works, a-sowin' theyselves constant, an' every little plant a-puttin' out a flower."

"Ain't there any Catholics?" asked Lovey Mary.

"Don't you see them hollyhawks an' snowballs an' laylacs? All of them are Catholics, takin' up lots of room an' needin' the prunin'-knife pretty often, but bringin' cheer and brightness to the whole garden when it needs it most. Yes, I guess you'd have trouble thinkin' of any sect I ain't got planted. Them ferns over in the corner is Quakers. I ain't never seen no Quakers, but they tell me that they don't b'lieve in flowerin' out; that they like coolness an' shade an' quiet, an' are jes the same the year round. These colea plants are the apes; they are all things to all men, take on any color that's round 'em, but if left to theyselves they run back to good-fer-nothin's. This here everlastin' is one of these here Christians that's so busy thinkin' 'bout dyin' that he fergits to live."

Miss Viny chuckled as she crumbled the dry flower in her fingers.

"See how different this is," she said, plucking a sprig of lemon-verbena. "This an' the mint an' the sage an' the lavender is all true Christians; jes by bein' touched they give out a' influence that makes the whole world a sweeter place to live in. But, after all, they can't all be alike! There's all sorts of Christians: some stands fer sunshine, some fer shade; some fer beauty, some fer use; some up high, some down low. There's jes one thing all the flowers has to unite in fightin' ag'inst—that's the canker-worm, Hate. If it once gits in a plant, no matter how good an' strong that plant may be, it eats right down to its heart."

"How do you get it out, Miss Viny?" asked Lovey Mary, earnestly.

"Prayer an' perseverance. If the Christian'll do his part, God'll do his'n. You see, I'm tryin' to be to these flowers what God is to his churches. The sun, which answers to the Sperrit, has to shine on 'em all, an' the rain, which answers to God's mercy, has to fall on 'em all. I jes watch 'em, an plan fer 'em, an' shelter 'em, an' love 'em, an' if they do their part they're bound to grow. Now I'm goin' to cut you a nice bo'quet to carry back to the Cabbage Patch."

CALLED HIGHER

A friend, in Burlington, Ia., writes: Mr. W. E. Tomlinson, a subscriber and reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD since 1877 — one who sent THE CHRISTIAN HERALD into many homes—"passed on" September 27, 1902. A pure and beautiful life brought to a peaceful end.

VIEW OF NEW YORK CITY FROM OUR PROPERTY

NEW YORK'S MILLIONAIRES

have, in many cases, made their fortunes in New York realestate. Shrewd business men are embracing the same opportunity to-day of securing a share in the tremendous increase of values of desirable property being opened up in the suburbs of Greater New York. Our property, on the Palisades, opposite Grant's Tomb, has already become a beautiful suburb; has macadam streets, flag walks, curb, gas, water, unexcelled sewerage system, schools, churches, etc. Sixty new homes built in two years; more going up now.

GRANTWOOD-ON-HUDSON

Lots sold in 1899 for $450; now bring $850. Values have doubled, and will double again, in the same time. Two-thirds of this property has been sold. Only 35 minutes to downtown commercial districts. Immediately west lies where we have made same improvements as at Grantwood. Large number of new houses, likewise $7,000 new R. R. Station, and beautiful Park, now in process of completion. Lots at Morsemere, $350. to $700. At Grantwood, $700. to $2,000. as desirable as those sold for the same price in Hatfield or Bronx (in the upper part of New York City) ten years ago, which now bring from $4000. to $20000. each. Easy payments: $15. down and $5. monthly, for lots under $700.

A MORSEMERE RESIDENCE

These properties have already proven their immense profit possibilities; but to demonstrate our faith in their future increase, we will guarantee that if the actual increased value within two years from your purchase is not equal to 15 per cent. per annum on your cash investment, we will refund your entire cash paid, with interest at 6 per cent.

R. R. STATION AT MORSEMERE

If interested, come to New York and visit these properties. We will pay your railroad fare. But don't delay. Take advantage of this opportunity at once. We strongly advise your reserving lots at once, as, owing to steady increase in values, prices will be advanced at least 10 per cent. within the next few months.

Write to-day for full particulars. Testimonials from buyers who have already sold at a profit, photographic views, etc.

QUAINT PSALMS for QUEER FOLK

By Rev. C. H. Yatman

PSALM XCVII
Blind Man's Psalm

10. Ye that love the Lord, hate evil: he preserveth the souls of his saints; he delivereth them out of the hand of the wicked.

11. Light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart.

12. Rejoice in the Lord, ye righteous; and give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness.

"LIGHT IS SOWN FOR THE RIGHTEOUS"

In this Psalm, blind men see. "Light is sown for the righteous," and the Lord of the whole earth is visible in the dark, for his lightnings and fire confound and consume the wicked and their wickedness, so he may preserve the soul of his saints. If you dwell in the dark, this Psalm gives you sympathy.

PSALM XCVIII
Singer's Psalm

4. Make a joyful noise unto the Lord, all the earth: make a loud noise, and rejoice, and sing praise.

5. Sing unto the Lord with the harp; with the harp, and the voice of a psalm.

6. With trumpets and sound of cornet make a joyful noise before the Lord, the King.

7. Let the sea roar, and the fulness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein.

"SING UNTO THE LORD"

Singers who have salvation, here get a new song, and it is sung with full choir and fine orchestra; to complete the harmony, the deep bass of the sea roars in, and the hills join with joyful music. This Psalm is a song of the soul for the singers.

PSALM XCIX
Psalm for Unholy People

1. The Lord reigneth; let the people tremble: he sitteth between the cherubim; let the earth be moved.

2. The Lord is great in Zion; and he is high above all the people.

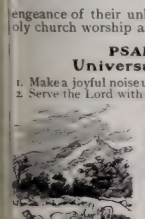
3. Let them praise thy great and terrible name; for it is holy.

"BETWEEN THE CHERUBIM"

Unholy folk need to know of a holy God. They are very apt to think people of their own stamp reign, but "The Lord reigneth" is told in thunder tones here. Even Moses, Aaron and Samuel, good as they were, found God took vengeance of their unholy inventions. Let a holy church worship a holy God.

PSALM C
Universal Psalm

1. Make a joyful noise unto the Lord, all ye lands.
2. Serve the Lord with gladness: come before his presence with singing.



"THE SHEEP OF HIS PASTURE"

3. Know ye that the Lord he is God: it is he that hath made us, and not we ourselves; we are his people, and the sheep of his pasture.

Possibly "Coronation Psalm" would be a better name. One needs to go to Scotland to hear it well sung, but it's for "all lands," and some sweet day, by and by, white, black, brown, yellow, and red folk will use this poem. I think when the truth of Revelation, chapter seven, being made history, "that great multitude which no man can number of all nations, tongues, tribes and peoples" singing this joyful oratorio, will sink all the sorrows of life in a flood of praise. If we sigh here, we shall sing there.

"A Source of Joy and Comfort"

My daughter is perfectly delighted with the Red Letter Testament. I cannot see how you give so much for so little money. I would be lost without the HERALD, as it is a source of joy, comfort, and even strengthspiring. ONE OF THE HERALD FAMILY.

The Red Letter Testament, with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD one year, $1.85.

DUNCAN CLARKE
Champion of Michigan

A "Money King" Among Boys

HE IS a "Captain of Industry"—a little "Money King" among his playmates. In controlling trade he is as shrewd as the money kings of the "grown-ups." And his profits are in proportion. Over $50.00 in Prize Money alone from The Saturday Evening Post within three months is his record.

He began by making a clean sweep of his block, getting everybody possible to sign an order directing him to deliver for four successive weeks. Street by street he canvassed his part of town with such success that all his boy friends were excited about it, and wrote to us clamoring to be agents. But Master Duncan had thought this problem all out for himself long before. He figured that we would not be apt to take chances on new boys to compete against him, if he could sell at the rate of 50 copies a week. So he wrote us a letter, requesting control of the whole town—knew he "could sell unassisted all the copies the people would buy"—wanted us to refuse all other boys; said he could "beat all of them put together, anyway," and wound up by inclosing a cash deposit to pay in advance for fifty copies a week for several months, just to show that he "meant business."

We complied with his request to refuse to sell to the other boys. Since then he has sold an average of 100 copies a week for almost a year. His town, lying in the copper country of the upper peninsula of Michigan, has been built four years and has just 750 inhabitants, and he is ten years old.

In a Dainty Little Booklet which we will send to any boy free, twenty-five out of more than six thousand bright boys tell in their own way just how they have made a success of selling THE SATURDAY EVENING POST. Pictures of the boys at work telling how they built up a paying business outside of school hours—interesting stories of real business tact.

Some of these boys are making $10 to $15 a week. You can do the same. NO MONEY REQUIRED TO START. We will furnish ten copies the first week free of charge, to be sold at five cents a copy. You can then send us the wholesale price for as many as you find you can sell the next week. IF YOU WILL TRY IT WE WILL SEND THE COPIES AND EVERYTHING NECESSARY.

$225 IN EXTRA CASH PRIZES will be distributed Next Month among boys who sell FIVE or more copies weekly.

IDLENESS*

A Prolific Source of Poverty, Misery and Iniquity

WORK, so far from being the curse with which it is commonly associated, is really a blessing. The picture of the ideal life given us in the first chapters of Genesis, contains the element of occupation: "The Lord God took the man and put him into the garden of Eden, to dress it and to keep it." He would probably not have been happy, even in Paradise, if he had had nothing to do. In one of the great novelist's strongest stories, a physician is represented as finding relief from intense sorrow and distress, by learning the trade of the shoemaker. It substituted the problems of the hand for the agony of the brain. Many men have learned the same lesson. The grief that eats out the heart is relieved in no way so readily as by getting to work. Work, therefore, ought to be recognized as a benefit independent of its reward. Better be at work without wages than spend the time in idleness.

Idleness is the prolific mother of all kinds of evil. It relaxes all the powers, leaving its victim a weakling. It robs him even of the repose that he desires, because healthful repose comes only to the man tired with labor. Above all, it leads to vice, for the natural propensities find in idleness a congenial soil in which they grow rank and luxuriant. That it leads also to poverty is a foregone conclusion. The idle man is not only incapable of earning, but he is incapable of protecting inherited property from the depredations of his enemies.

So insidious is the habit of idleness that every man, and especially every young man, ought to be vigilant over its beginning. When he finds himself shrinking from difficult tasks, when he begins to postpone to another day duties that ought to be done at once, when he chooses the less promising path because it is the easier, when he allows an opportunity of doing useful work to escape him—in any of these signs he should recognize a danger signal, and should set himself resolutely to overcome a tendency which threatens his ruin.

The Resurrection†

The Transformed and Regenerated Soul has Resurrection in Life

HOW passionately men in all ages have longed to pierce the veil that falls on every closed life, we well know. We have the same intense desire, but we, like the ancient sages, fail to penetrate it. Perhaps we could not understand, even if we were told. We know that we leave the body behind us, and when we are stripped of the senses by which we perceive life, how can we conceive of life? In any case, we do not know and cannot know. But the Bible bids us hope, and Jesus was emphatic in his assurance that we shall have another life, that death is not the end.

What then may we hope for? Not simply immortality. That would be a boon of doubtful value. Ask the weary toiler, the harassed and worried burden-bearer if the mere continuance of life would be welcome to him. We long for better conditions; we hope for higher powers; we aspire to larger life. What then? Are we simply to wait until they are conferred upon us? Christ's words forbid such an attitude. There is such a thing as resurrection in life. We know well enough what is low and grovelling and ignoble in our being. Is it not possible to die to all that and to rise into a higher life? We cannot imagine that the gratification of the senses, or the love of money, or the struggle for fame or power, will be continued after death. But the kindness, the unselfishness, the purity of thought and action, and many other high characteristics will persist. Why, then, may not He who said, "I am the resurrection and the life," so come into our lives that all these immortal qualities may be quickened and nourished? So may we who are dead to heavenly realities obey the divine voice which Lazarus heard, and come forth, as he came, into new life.

FLOWER AND SEED CATALOGUES

Burpee's Farm Annual for 1903 ought to be in the hands of every farmer gardener and florist. The book contains a great deal of valuable information, it is not stereotyped, but written from fresh notes taken during growth of the various crops and thousands of comparative trials save the publishers. The experience gained during twenty-seven years of seed growing by such a firm is something the progressive planter will be eager to avail himself of, and many will doubtless send for the annual. It is liberally illustrated and has attractive colored plates. Planters visiting Philadelphia are invited to inspect the new Burpee Building and there secure permits to visit Fordhook Farms, the "largest trial grounds in America." Pp. 188. W. Atlee Burpee & Co., Philadelphia, Pa.

Condensed Catalogue of Specialties, Novelties, and Specific Offers will be welcomed by customers who for years have bought seeds, plants, bulbs and fruit trees from John Lewis Childs, Floral Park, N.Y. A seedsman, florist, and publisher of that well known horticultural monthly The Mayflower, and of the little 15 monthly The Harbinger, which is devoted to the study of our 12 native birds, setting forth their usefulness in orchard, farm and garden. The catalogue describes a number of choice new and useful fruits, vegetables and flowers, and announces some attractive premiums.

Garden Annual, 1903. Every beautiful thing that grows in a garden, and all manner of succulent and nutritious things found therein, supply the subjects discussed and pictured in this dainty and useful book. Here are stories of asparagus and tomatoes and melons and corn to make the mouth water, and of roses and sweet peas and pansies and pinks and poppies to set the eye and nostril aflame with desire; instructions as to how all these may be had and how they may be grown are not spared—these matters being set forth by expert florists and gardeners than whom there are no better or more reliable authorities. J. Roscoe Fuller & Co., Floral Park, New York.

Everything for the Garden. Henderson's Annual is always one of the handsomest sent out. Each year it is, if anything, a finer work of art than the season preceding. There are colored plates in this, notably that of "Sweet Peas," worthy of framing. But beauty of presentation would count for little were it not for the solid facts back of it when one comes to a question of seed buying and seed growing. These solid facts consist of correct data about grasses for lawns and golf courses and for cattle-feed; about beans and beets and onions and cabbage and other supplies that come up out of the earth for man's sustenance; and about grapes, berries and flowers that delight and refresh him. Pp. 186. Peter Henderson & Co., 35-37 Cortlandt street, New York City.

Maule's Seed Catalogue, 1903. This is a good book for "everybody who buys anything to sow or plant." It is another annual that is a work of art; some of the pictures make one hungry and thirsty. "Maule's New Model Muskmelon" on the cover, is just the tempting dish to begin breakfast with. Such fine tomatoes, onions and lettuce come after for lunch and dinner, with scarlet radishes, and fat, full beans and mealy potatoes, and celery, all fit to please an epicure's palate and to nourish a strong man for his work. Then, here are flowers of every sort and shade to adorn the garden and to gladden the eye. Pp. 137. Wm. Henry Maule, Philadelphia, Pa.

Our New Guide to Rose Culture. Although the "Queen of Flowers" claims the larger share of this pamphlet, a liberal number of pages is given to ferns, fine chrysanthemums, lilies, dahlias and other garden glories, and due space to select garden vegetables. Pp. 171; handsomely illustrated. Dingee & Conard Co., West Grove, Pa.

New Floral Guide. The "Queen of Flowers" again has right of precedence. Some new varieties are described. But cannas, fuchsias, geraniums and all their glorious company, follow in the rose's train, and wise words about bringing them all to perfection are written. Several pages are devoted to fine lawns and their care. Pp. 135. Conard & Jones Co., West Grove, Pa.

Landreth's Seed Catalogue. Seeds, plants, trees, vines, fruits, nuts are presented in good illustrations, and timely hints in regard to their culture furnished by experienced growers. Pp. 81. D. Landreth & Sons, Philadelphia, Pa.

Catalogues for Spring. Fruits, plants and vines and ornamental trees, plants and vines are the specialties in this attractively-illustrated manual issued by Green's Nursery Co., Rochester, N.Y.

Dreer's Garden Calendar. This annual is a beauty. The cover is particularly handsome. There are a number of fine colored plates; and the book is a real library of information about seeds, plants, bulbs, etc. Pp. 209. Henry A. Dreer, Philadelphia, Pa.

Annual Catalogue Iowa Seed Co. A very attractive, full and complete manual of information about fine seeds and plants, fruits, flowers, vegetables, grains and grasses. Pp. 133; illustrated. Issued by Iowa Seed Co., Des Moines, Iowa, a firm established thirty-three years ago.

Catalogue of Vegetable and Flower Seeds. Old reliable garden products and novelties in vegetable, fruit and flower seeds are brought to the reader's attention, together with a number of improved implements for garden culture. James J. H. Gregory & Son, Marblehead, Mass.

The Storrs & Harrison Co.'s Catalogue (Springfield, Ohio), displays in colors on the front cover a handsome new rose and a variety of clematis recently introduced from Japan; on the back some very fine cherries, currants, raspberries and pears. The pages are crowded with pictures and information about flowers, fruits and nuts and ornamental shrubs and trees.

The Family Garden. A handbook on the treatment of all kinds of garden vegetables, flowers and small fruits. This is really a valuable compendium of information and instruction. Sent free with every order for $1.00 worth of seeds from the publishers, L. Templin & Sons, Calla, Ohio, who also issue a catalogue Ideal Seeds, Bulbs, Plants, etc., sent free on application.

Stark Bro's Nurseries and Orchards Co., who may be addressed at Dansville, N.Y., or Louisiana, Mo., are sending out interesting illustrated literature about beautiful and luscious fruits. They present some striking specialties in apples, plums and grapes, and give much attention to ornamental trees and shrubs.

FLORAL BUTTERFLY PLANT

No plant possesses so many good points as do those glorious new Cosmedullas. Of graceful trailing habit, superb for carpet bedding or for hanging pots—pots they bloom every day in the year. In the garden from May until frost, showing daily scores of large ranged butterfly-like blossoms. Color (No. 1) the most beautiful blue to be found in any flower. A shade so positively lovely as to baffle description. Thrives in sun or shade, wet or dry, rich or poor soil; as easily sown as a weed from seed or cuttings, grows rapidly, covers at once, and propagates so easily that plants are very cheap. Blooms in 50 days from seed.

No. 1 Exquisite Blue, like tropical Butterflies.

No. 2 Rosy Pink, in other respects like No. 1.

Strong plants for blooming at once by mail guaranteed to grow, 20c each; the 2 for 30c, 5 for 60c.

Seed of both colors mixed, 25 cts. per packet.

Cleaning Hair is a dirty job

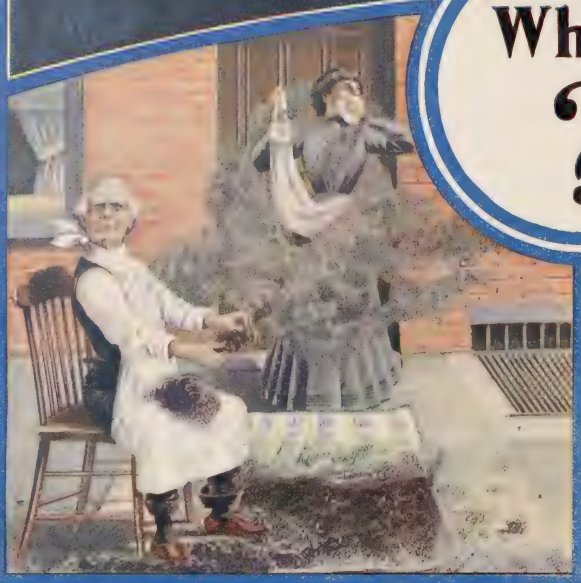
The Ostermoor needs only a sun bath



HAIR MATTRESS—A Tick Stuffed

Every hair mattress is a tick stuffed with animal hair, often swarming with disease germs. Our advertising has driven the old-line makers to claim "sterilized" hair, which is absurd; for the only process that would be effective destroys the value of the hair—makes it brittle and lifeless.

The hair-stuffed tick gets lumpy—has to be "made over" every three or four years, at a greater expense each time.

THE "OSTERMOOR"—Built, Not Stuffed

Each Ostermoor mattress is built—not stuffed. Hand-laid sheets of snowy whiteness, each the full size, are carefully compressed into the tick. The Ostermoor Patent Elastic Felt is purity itself, germ-free and vermin-proof.

Ostermoor mattresses cannot get lumpy, never need renewing; an occasional sun-bath is all they require. The tick can be taken off and washed whenever soiled.

The Ostermoor PATENT ELASTIC FELT Mattress $15.

Health, Clear Skin and Good Figure

I wish I could put sufficient emphasis into these words to induce every woman who sees this advertisement to at least write to me.

I have spent twelve years in prescribing reducing, developing and curative exercises for women in person, and my marvelous success in my work and my desire to reach and help more women induced me to take up the course of physical culture by mail. I can take only a limited number of pupils because I give each one my personal attention, and no two lessons are exactly alike: each woman receives just the work adapted to her individual needs—no more.

I know that I can give you Health, Strength and a Good Figure; relieve you from NERVOUSNESS, CONSTIPATION, HEADACHES, INDIGESTION, TORPID LIVER, OBESITY, LEANNESS and all so-called chronic ailments, and build up women who are run down.

I prefer to let my students speak for me, and the following extracts are from letters from my pupils:

"I am not nearly so nervous. My chest expansion is four inches and the best of all I am gaining in weight."

"My height is increased a good inch. My hip measurement has reduced from 44 to 38 inches."

"It seems wonderful that the exercises could have helped me so much in a short time. the exercises for the eyes are so good, as are all your other exercises."

"My husband, who has been away for six weeks, was so surprised and delighted over my reduction and my improved figure."

"I never felt or looked as well as at the present time. I have not had an attack of indigestion and but one headache in six weeks, and compared with the previous weeks it is a miracle."

"My constipation is entirely relieved. I only wish I had known of your physical culture years ago. I should have been saved four 12 years of suffering. Your breathing exercises are helping me greatly."

"I feel better in every way. Lighter, brighter and a desire to live. My nerves are better and my general health improved. My carriage is very materially better."

"Since I began working with you I have increased my chest expansion 3 inches, my diaphragm expansion from 2 to 5 inches, my bust measurement from 32 to 36. I have lengthened my front waist line 2 inches."

"Never in my life have I been as well as I am now, and I am indeed grateful to you. My sister, who had not seen me for three months, was surprised at my changed appearance."

Hon. Wm. T. Harris, LL.D., U. S. Commissioner of Education, says: "It is the glory of the present revival of physical exercises that it is not by empirical physicians. It is a new movement of the highest importance. It means the end of the era of quackery in hygiene."

Dr. Frank W. Cornish, D.D., LL.D., writes me "Your thorough preparation for your work and your high aim must surely give you a worthy success."

My exercises cultivate the distinguished carriage and bearing which at once bespeak culture and refinement. Men cannot do this work for women. They do not understand our conditions nor limitations.

Write to me. For 10 cents I will send you full information regarding my system, and testimonial letters from numbers of women who have worked with me, an instructive and interesting booklet, and a card for your dressing-table, showing the correct lines of the woman's figure.

Yours for a body expressing perfect health, perfect grace and perfect womanhood.

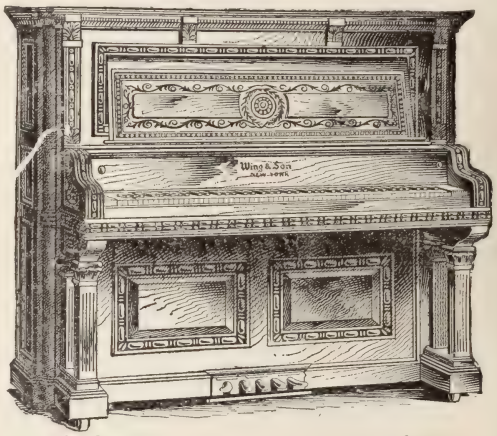
"FOR 35 YEARS A STANDARD PIANO."

The Wing Piano

From the Factory at Wholesale Price

By buying directly from the Manufacturers. The WING PIANOS are known the world over, and thousands of them are in the homes of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers.



A Wing style—45 other styles to select from

SAVE FROM $100 TO $200

We make the Wing Piano and sell it ourselves. It goes direct from our factory to your home. We do not employ any agents or salesmen, and do not sell through dealers or retail stores. When you buy the Wing Piano you pay the actual cost of making it and our one small wholesale profit. This profit is small because we sell thousands of pianos yearly. Most retail stores sell no more than twelve to twenty pianos yearly and must charge from $100 to $200 profit on each. Think for yourself; they cannot help it.

SENT ON TRIAL

We Pay Freight—No Money in Advance

We will send any Wing Piano to any part of the United States on trial. We pay freight in advance and do not ask for any advance payment or deposit. If the piano is not satisfactory after twenty days' trial in your home, we take it back entirely at our expense. You pay us nothing unless you keep the piano. There is absolutely no risk or expense to you.

Old and Unsatisfactory Instruments Taken in Exchange.

Easy Monthly Payments

In 35 Years Over 36,000 Pianos

EASTER DAY IN JERUSALEM

The Strange Spectacle of the "Holy Fire," as Described by an Eye-Witness

JERUSALEM was thronged with pilgrims. As we rode in through the new parts, outside the old walls, it seemed as if all the city were having holiday; and after passing in through the Jaffa gate, the crowds became more dense. So did the dust and the heat.

The streets were busy. In spite of the sun, people of all colors and races were crowding and pushing, all hurrying to one point, the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. It was the day before the Greek Easter, and at two o'clock, they told us, "holy fire from heaven" would descend upon the sepulchre of Christ, as an eternal token of his resurrection from the dead. There were manly-looking officers and seamen from the Greek man-of-war stationed at Jaffa, native priests, with their queer stove-pipe hats, and tall, solemn fanatics from Abyssinia; but most numerous of all were the multitudes of Russian peasants, stolid and solemn, the men all wearing heavy beards, and with long, light hair parted over meek foreheads. Poor peasants! They come at enormous expense, and even at risk of life, thousands of weary miles, over muddy roads and in filthy steerages. They are so simple, so sincere, as ignorant and trustful as the dumb beasts. However we may condemn the priests, we can only pity the people.

Of course there was no place for us on the floor of the crowded church, but through the kindness of our consul, ten or twelve American gentlemen were admitted to a little archway reserved for the purpose. Under the guidance of the consular dragoman and two kawasses, a path was cleared for us, and we were led safely through the dark mazes of the crowded building, and up to a gallery, some forty feet above the main floor. We were under the great dome, in the best possible place for witnessing the coming ceremony. Below was a sight never to be forgotten. Under the centre of the dome is the Chapel of the Sepulchre—an ugly, octagonal building, about twenty-six feet long and seventeen wide. Around this, a narrow aisle was kept open by Turkish soldiers. There must have been a couple of regiments of them. The privates locked arms all along both sides of this pathway, and the officers preserved order by the unsparing use of rawhide whips. Except for this narrow aisle, the whole building was packed with people, not only under the rotunda, but out in every direction as far as we could see.

I have been in many great crowds in New York and Chicago, but I never saw such a crowd as this. Men and women were pressed together so that they could not even move their hands. The front ranks were driven back by the strength of hundreds of soldiers, and by the blows of whips: the rear ranks were simply crushed, until they could be crushed no more. There were many fights; fierce ones, too, not like the good-natured struggles of an American crowd. Most of the people had been standing there since the night before, standing perhaps twenty hours in that heat and stench! No wonder they lost their tempers! Now two big Syrians would enter into a fierce struggle for some place of vantage. Now a priest would vainly attempt to force his way through the solid mass. The scene was strained, crowded, filthy, earnest, cruel. We heard afterward that several Russians were trampled to death. It is probably true. Such things happen nearly every year.

It is now one o'clock. The ceremony is not due till two; but it is beginning already. The Greek patriarch, resplendent with gold and jewels, marches around the Chapel of the Sepulchre, followed by bishops and deacons, only less gorgeous than himself. Now the crowd takes up a chant, fierce and loud and monotonous, and a roll of thunder comes from the voices of 10,000 pilgrims, who are at the consummation of their hopes. I was told that the chant begins like this:

> God has come to earth to-day;
> we are saved by his blood.
> We are glad, but the Jews are > sorrowful.

After encircling the chapel three times, the Greek patriarch was joined by the Armenian patriarch and both entered the sacred building. What happens inside? The Greek priests say that fire descends from heaven upon the sepulchre of Christ. A man, who stood next me, derided this as "a heathenish farce." It would be interesting to enter with the two patriarchs and see how they act in the presence of this greatest of mysteries, or this greatest of impostures. But to the multitude outside, it is all intensely true.

The moment has come! The fire is to be handed out through a hole in the side of the chapel. Near it are stationed a score of large, muscular men, dressed only in their underclothing. They are runners, strong men of the different churches, who will take the fire and carry it to their chapels, which are scattered throughout the great building—Coptic, Armenian, Greek, Abyssinian, Syriac.

THE CEREMONY OF THE "HOLY FIRE" IN THE CHAPEL OF THE SEPULCHRE

Everyone is silent now. The great bell suddenly begins clanging, as if for an alarm of fire, and again the throng takes up its weird, thunderous chant. A spark appears at the opening. A runner lights his torch and holds it under his bent body, while two others

INSANE PEOPLE TAUGHT TO SING SWEET HYMNS

A REMARKABLE feature of the Easter services in Philadelphia this year will be a song service, by a choir composed entirely of insane vocalists. Selecting a number of men and women from the inmates of the Asylum for the Insane in Philadelphia, Mrs. Hughes, widow of the former resident physician of the institution, has, by dint of the most patient training, developed from this unpromising material a band of singers whose rendition of sacred songs has attracted numbers to the services that are held each Sunday in the chapel at the almshouse adjoining the asylum.

The experiment of teaching mentally unbalanced persons to sing hymns, and march in processional during church service, was thought by many to be an attempt at the impossible. At first, it was necessary for attendants to constantly watch the insane singers during rehearsal, for fear of bodily danger to the teacher. But Mrs. Hughes, although once attacked while the service was in progress, refused to give in, and by firmness and kindness she has not only brought the choir to a marvelous standard of musical skill, but has so brought the mindless pupils under her control that a word or a look from her is sufficient. In fact, it has become possible to hold rehearsals with only one attendant, the nurse, who officiates at the organ.

One of the greatest punishments that can be inflicted upon any member of the choir is to be forbidden to attend rehearsals, or to be ejected from the choir-room. It is only necessary to threaten a rebellious patient with expulsion, to ensure good behavior for the rest of the session.

A stranger, finding his way into the room in which this strangest of all choirs is at rehearsal, would hardly suspect the mental condition of the singers. With Mrs. Hughes beating time, the singing swells out to the accompaniment of the organ, not a note out of place, not a voice discordant.

The hymns that are usually chosen are not simple Gospel tunes, but sometimes difficult musical selections that it would be supposed none but clear-minded men and women could be taught to render.

Some vocalists are harmless in their dementia. Others are a source of continual anxiety to the attendants. One soprano with a fine voice, will swallow all the nails, pins, needles and other hardware that she can get hold of, and is periodically in the hospital, despite the most vigilant watching. Some of the patients are morphine wrecks, and are difficult to control. The sweetest singer in the choir has to be watched day and night in order to prevent her committing suicide. All have some pet fancy or other; but to hear them sing with enthusiasm is one of the most remarkable experiences of this age of unusual doings. H. D. JONES.

A TEMPERANCE ARMY OF CHILDREN

EARNEST Christians everywhere who are interested in enlisting the young in temperance movements, will be pleased to read the following letter from Mr. J. K. Snyder, Superintendent of the Loyal Temperance Legion of Camden, N. J., an organization of remarkable growth and of much usefulness:

"We have been engaged in the Sunday School work from childhood. Our labors as teachers began in 1878, when our especial power for drawing the children to us seemed to be that of song. For about twenty years my wife and I have been alone in the work, depending only on our Divine Father for help and guidance. It is for twenty-five years that we have been especially identified with this temperance work.

We organized the Loyal Temperance No. 1 in 1887. Since that time thousands of children have been under our care and influence. We have seen many little ones accept the Master, pledging themselves to follow him in temperance truth and holiness. God lets us plant the seed, and he gives the increase.

"Our Legion meets every Sabbath at 9.30 A.M. We have known some of our children to come without their breakfast, so eager were they for the meeting. The Legion is a branch of the Wiley M. E. Church work, but we maintain it financially ourselves. Reports are made to the Church quarterly or semi-yearly of our progress. We give one or two concerts a year, and generally have a picnic on Decoration Day, and in the fall a nutting picnic, and do everything we can to make the children happy.

"Our last report showed the year's attendance, 4,051; cards given out, 3,715; picture tracts, 3,065, etc. We don't know how we manage to do the work and meet the expenses. Our only help is that received from a few of the children. I am regularly employed at my business. My wife has a large house to look after and take care of; the many boys and girls that come in to be helped or entertained keep her busy. Somehow the Lord directs and helps us, so that we find time for everything. It is a great pleasure to train the children in the singing; she plays and I lead, and the earnest little voices follow heartily.

"Every meeting, rehearsal or concert is begun with prayer. The Lord gives the success we pray for.

"We reward the children for continuous attendance; giving Bibles, testaments or what we can afford; we gave out yesterday nineteen golden text-books as rewards. One of our scholars has not missed a Sabbath for nearly three years. We have no teachers to assist us—often visitors, but no teachers. There is a large primary department to the Legion and a long 'cradle roll.' Of course, we have to plan and study to do all we need to do. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD forms an important part in our readings and meditations. Our boys and girls derive much benefit from it. In our various calls we carry the paper to the sick, and the shut-ins. Our boys take them sometimes to the jails. Our work is done without money and without price, in His Name. This incident shows what precious rewards we sometimes receive: My wife and I were called to Kensington, Philadelphia, on New Year's Day. While there the young man (he was about 23) of the house where we stopped, came into the parlor and handing my wife a book said, 'Do you remember this?' It was a Bible she had given him when a mere boy, with our temperance pledge pasted on the fly-leaf. She had forgotten about it. He told her he had been true to his pledge, and that he was trying to be true to his Bible."

rush him through the crowd and out of the church. Now he is mounted and galloping towards Bethlehem. Others of the strong men light their torches and, forming wedges, they rush through the struggling crowd and bring the fire to their chapel. The Abyssinian team makes frantic efforts, but again and again their torch is put out by the opposing factions, and it is only at the fifth rush that they are successful.

Here and there in the multitude, men have caught the fire. Each pilgrim has a torch made of twenty or more candles and the flame is passed from one to another. Ropes carry it up to galleries above. Away down the long aisles lights appear. Now the whole building is one mass of fire and smoke. And all the while the great bell is clanging, and ten thousand throats are roaring out a chant which is half a praise to God, and half a curse upon their fellow-men.

Poor pilgrims! they let the smoke of the candles play around their faces and naked breasts. "It will not burn them," they say. They will save these candles, and will light them upon festal occasions or on the days of sacred feasts.

The very caps with which they extinguish the flame are sacred, and will be worn upon their death-beds as a sure passport to paradise.

Poor pilgrims! They are so happy now. You can see it upon their homely, careworn faces. For they have journeyed far to see the Holy City, and they have "lighted their candles at the very flame of God!"

HARK! TO THE EASTER SONG

Before Christ "Athenians celebrated earth's awakening and blossoming with pipes and pæans of praise and processions to the violet-crowned hill of the Acropolis." The word Easter is derived from the name of the Anglo-Saxon Goddess of Spring, Eostre or Ostara. All ancient peoples greeted nature's renewal with rites religious. Christ's resurrection informed the spring festival with divine promise for man; early Christians kept vigil till cock-crow, and then the stillness of the night was rent by the joyful acclamation: "The Lord is risen! The Lord is risen!" From remotest antiquity, the egg, holder of the germ of existence and type of the universe, and the hare, type of the Light-Giver in Darkness (the moon, in which its picture was supposed to be seen), and in itself of abounding fruitfulness, have been symbols of life's renewal; to-day, Parsees of Bombay distribute eggs at their spring festival, as the Chinese, Egyptians, Persians, Romans, and Greeks did thousands of years ago. With influx of foreign population, the egg and the hare are more and more the chief decorations of American shop-windows at Easter. Our white lily is the old Egyptian symbol of joy immortal, the Greek type of purity.

Nowhere are the pleasant home features of Easter more observed than in Germany and Holland, nowhere do "hares lay" more eggs for children to find. Easter is a great time for wedding-bells in Kaiser Wilhelm's country; pastors of the State Church exact no fee for marriage service Easter Monday, which is an advantage for the poor, and sometimes twenty-five couples stand in a row before the minister, making vows in unison. In some parts of Europe, peasants keep vigil on hills for the rising of the sun, which, they say, "dances for joy Easter morning." White-robed watchers in Silesia, on a hill called "Calvary," appear in the dawn like spirits rising from a graveyard, which the place resembles. The people in the valley, looking up at them, cry, "Easter!" In Hungary, youths sprinkle maidens with rose water, and receive eggs in return. Provincial Great Britain is rich in quaint and curious Easter customs.

Rome, of course, celebrates Easter with such magnificence of ritual, music and decoration, as can be found nowhere else. Here, as in Russia, food prepared for Easter must be blessed by the priests. The city is filled with tourists from everywhere. Paris, too, is a great centre of attraction at Easter, when the gay and beautiful city, at its loveliest, is compared to a tremendous flower and fashion show. Everybody — nurses and washerwomen included — wear sprigs of green: windows of even the very poor are gay with bits of bloom.

"Christ is risen!" "He is risen of a truth!" Bearded Russians, exchanging this salutation, kiss each other. Easter began at midnight, in cathedral or church, where peasants knelt in darkness on cold stones until twelve, when lights flared up and priests acclaimed and choirs chanted: "Christos voskress!" ("Christ is risen!") and the multitude, as in one great sob of joy, responded: "Vo istenu voskress." ("He is risen of a truth!") They have been fasting many days. Now may they feast. Paul calls on Ivan and his wife, offers her an egg, and receives one which he gives his next hostess. Every entertainer serves refreshments. The Czar and Czarina present their courtiers such eggs as the rich Viennese interchange, and as many kings and queens are wont to bestow on friends and favorites at this season — eggs of mother-of-pearl, silver or gold, holding "trinkets or ducats." Egg-making, in which hens have no part, is a great industry, by which many artificers make the money that buys the Easter feast for wife and little ones. According to Russian etiquette, a peasant at Easter, offering a princess an egg, may, with it, give the kiss of brotherhood.

"Christ is risen!" From Tyrolean hills picturesque jodelers (carolers) send loud and clear upon the night the joyous words, and jodelers on other hills repeat, while from people in valleys below floats up response: "He is risen indeed!" until all the land sings of the resurrection. Torches flash forth; dwellers in castle or hut greet passing jodelers, offering meat, pastry and eggs. Children run into each other's arms, lisping, "Christ is risen!" Sweethearts embrace; old feuds are forgotten.

THE SAVIOUR'S TRIUMPHAL ENTRY INTO JERUSALEM, (From an Old Painting)

THE TRIUMPHAL ENTRY

The American Pulpit

A SERMON BY
Rev. Frank De Witt Talmage, D.D.

TEXT—John 12: 13:
"Took branches of palm trees, and went forth to meet him, and cried Hosanna"

THIS is Palm Sunday. In the ecclesiastical year, it is the day on which we commemorate the strange scene on the Judæan road which constituted the one sole pageant of our Lord's life. It is the day that ushers in Holy Week, the beginning of which saw him riding into Jerusalem in triumph, and the end lying in Joseph of Arimathea's tomb. This is the time when the same surging crowds which, a few days later, will cry, "Crucify him! Crucify him!" now make the Judæan hills echo and re-echo with their exultant shouts of "Hosanna to the Son of David! Hosanna to the King!"

Appropriate, also, is my subject in reference to the audience to which I speak! I know not of any class of people to whom the significant lessons of Palm Sunday can be better applied than to ourselves. Christ among the waving palms ought to have for us Gospel teachings, as well as Christ in Pilate's Judgment Hall. Christ among the vociferating multitudes should appeal to us suggestively, as well as Jesus carrying his cross, Jesus resurrected from the grave, Jesus appearing unto his disciples after the crucifixion, or Jesus ascending from Mount Olivet.

Transient Adherence

Palm Sunday emphasizes the truth that a false and a selfish adoration of Jesus Christ never results in a triumphant and a lasting worship. Why did that great concourse of people, which came forth to welcome Jesus into the Davidic capital, soon turn upon Christ, and become his taunting executioners? Why did they one day throw under his feet the branches of palm, which have always been the symbol of victory, and within a week be eager to mock his dying agonies upon Calvary? They were not welcoming Christ as their spiritual Saviour. They were merely greeting him as a temporal king, who would lead them on to national victories, as Napoleon did the French, Frederick the Great the Prussians, Alexander the Greeks, as Rameses the Second the Egyptians, or Saladin the Saracens, when he totally defeated the Crusaders near Tiberias, and captured their leader, Guy de Susignan, in 1187. They were not welcoming a Messiah for whom they must, if necessary, suffer and die; but they were greeting one whom they believed to be about to drive the Roman tyrants off the Hebrew soil; one who would restore the Solomonic grandeur, when the national treasury would be full of gold, and the kings and the queens of the north, east, south, and west, would make pilgrimages to Jerusalem, as the Queen of Sheba came, bringing her presents of spices and precious stones. Thus, when Christ allowed himself to be arrested as a common criminal, the rabble wanted to destroy him, because they had cherished in their breasts the false hope of a temporal dominion.

Interested Motives

My friends, is our faith in Jesus unsatisfactory? Are we, too, worshiping Christ from selfish and not from spiritual motives? Do we attend the fashionable church in our neighborhood, merely to win social prestige, rather than with the desire to fit us to help the troubled and the lost? I once had a physician bluntly tell me that he joined the church with the same purpose for which he joined the club; he went to both places, so that he could be brought into contact with people, and win as many patients as he could. I wonder how many of us are kind to our friends solely from the selfish motive to make our friends kind to us. It is possible to even feed the hungry with the most mercenary of desires. Christ stated this when he said: "When thou makest a dinner or a supper, call not thy friends, nor thy brethren, nor thy kinsmen, nor thy rich neighbors, lest they also bid thee again, and recompense can be made thee." In other words, we should not make our Christian engagements merely a case of reciprocity—you do so much for me, and I will do so much for you. But when you make a gospel feast, ask that young man to your home who has no friends, and is alone in a great city. Ask that young girl, who has no chance of coming in touch with a refined family circle, unless you give her an invitation. "Call the poor, the maimed, the lame, and the blind, and thou shalt be blessed, for they cannot recompense thee."

Are we, this Palm Sunday, in our worship, honoring Christ with the unselfish purpose of the disciples, who were accompanying him from Bethany, and who not only threw the palm branches in his way, but who were also ready to die for him? Or are we worshiping Jesus with the selfish adoration of the great host that came out from Jerusalem to welcome him as a temporal king?

Palm Sunday emphasizes the reckless and unreasoning fickleness of the human race. Christ, the popular favorite, being led to crucifixion within six days after his triumphal entry into Jerusalem, has his counterpart all over the world. Human likes and dislikes, adulation and denunciation, approbation and prejudice are very apt to tread upon each others' heels. The oscillating pendulum which swings one way, gathers momentum to swing as far the other way.

If we make an idol of common human clay, as the French did of General Boulanger in 1889, then in a very little while we may become iconoclasts and smash our idol, and also the shrine before which we once worshiped. President Carnot understood this fickleness of the human race. When the "Man on Horseback," as Boulanger was called, threatened to ride down the Champs Elysees and overthrow the French Republic, some of the leading statesmen, like Ex-premier Waldeck-Rousseau, wanted the President to quietly lead Boulanger to the outskirts of the city and have him shot—for the good of France. The President only smiled at his friends' anxiety. He said to them, "Wait wait just a few months. The rabble will turn. Then the most popular man of France will be the most despised. Such popular adoration as this is always short lived." Carnot spoke better than he knew. Not only did the tidal wave of public adoration which threatened to lift the "Man on Horseback" into the Tuileries subside, but within a few months, General Boulanger was friendless. In despair he committed suicide while an exile in Brussels.

The Fickle Multitude

The Duke of Wellington well understood the fickleness of popular applause. Long after the conqueror of Napoleon had regained his popularity, and had become the most beloved subject of the Victorian Empire, he always kept the fence around his city home broken down, as an object lesson, to recall the time when the London mob battered it down, to show their disgust at one of his official acts as Prime Minister. William E. Gladstone was again and again execrated in the streets of the British capital, through which his dead body was afterward carried to sleep its last sleep among the honored dead of Westminster, the Prince of Wales, now King, being among the pall-bearers. Joan of Arc, who led the French armies to victory, was deserted by her followers, who came to believe her a witch and a devil. The same tongue which once charmed the Roman assemblies, was afterward cut out from the mouth of Cicero by the mobs, and nailed up in the Roman Forum, with the epitaph, "Thou fool, wag no more!" Ah! we do not have to stand among the vociferating multitudes of Palm Sunday to hear and see the fickleness of the human race. We can see everywhere the human idols being shattered. The same voices that are ready to cry to us, "Put him upon a throne," are the voices which to-morrow will call, "Lead him away to execution."

Now, my brother, as the adoration of the human race is so short lived, it does not pay to sacrifice everything for popular applause. Cannot and will not we live with the nobler and higher purpose of trying to have God rather than man think well of us? Would that we might one and all heed the blessed advice which "Chinese" Gordon, a short time before his death, wrote to a friend, then living in distant England:

"Dear Friend: Why will you keep caring for what the world says? Try, oh try, to be no longer a slave to it. You have little idea of the comfort of freedom from it. It is bliss! All this caring for what people will say, is your pride. Hoist your flag, and abide by it. Thank God, I am quite well, and so happy now, that I resigned the government of the province, and put all the faults on my 'Friend.' He is able to bear them, and will use me, as long as He pleases, as his mouthpiece, and when He is done with me He will put me one side. 'Casting all your care on Him,' has just come to mind."

Palm Sunday indicates the city as the greatest of all battle-grounds, where the spiritual conquest of a sinful world is to be decided. It is the field of Esdraelon—the Armageddon, where the Satanic and Divine powers will make their last stand, and grip and wrestle in mortal combat. It is the Sedan where the demoniac invaders will be annihilated, as a chemist with a pestle crushes a substance in a mortar. It is the Waterloo, the Yorktown, the Agrigentum, the Solferino, the Chalons, the Thermopylæ, where all the powers and principalities of darkness shall be forever overthrown by the principalities and powers of light, and Christ shall be proclaimed King of kings, and Lord of all!

Why is the city to be the great field whereon the sovereignty of Christ shall be universally recognized? In the city there is a commingling of all classes. Among the throngs who came forth on Palm Sunday to greet Jesus, I see the good and the bad, the autocrat and the plebeian, the mighty capitalist and the small shopkeeper, the Pharisee, the disciple, the curiosity-seeker, all commingling, all circling, some cheering, and some cursing under their breath. We are not to suppose for a moment that all who came forth to see Jesus, threw branches in his way. Oh, no! The High Priest's hirelings were in that crowd, as well as Jesus' disciples. I am thankful that you and I live in a great city. We live in a city where our influence for good can tell most effectively, if we only use that influence as Jesus would have us do. If we capture Paris for Christ, we capture France; London for Christ means England saved; Berlin for Christ means Germany bowing before the Cross. If we capture New York and Chicago and our other great cities, for Christ, we capture America for Christ. Oh, what a blessed opportunity it is for us to be able to fight under the standard of the Cross, where the satanic forces are unlimbering their heaviest artilleries, and where every blow struck for Jesus can redound with the best of all results!

But while I congratulate you because you are able to testify for Jesus in a large city, I also cast my eyes over the hills, and send forth gospel congratulation to the Christian farmhouses that are helping us in this Christian struggle. A city is a great human reservoir which collects its streams of life from everywhere. Many of those streams trickle down from country hills, where cattle are lowing, and horses neighing, and sheep bleating, and harvests waving. These country streams of human life are the brooks which clarify the muddy waters of a large metropolis. The country farmer and his wife are very apt to fear that their boys and their girls will be swallowed up in a large city, and never heard from again. But I want to tell you that the majority of the mightiest workers for Christ in the large cities have been born upon a farm. A short time ago, thirty-eight prominent business men of New York City sat at a banquet in the Union League Club on Fifth Avenue. How many of them do you suppose came from the country? Thirty-six out of the thirty-eight gentlemen present. A history of prominent lawyers, ministers, doctors and merchants in a large city was once compiled. Eighty per cent. were found to come from the country. Thus, ye farmers and farmers' wives, do not mourn whenever your stout-limbed boys and beloved girls leave you for the great cities. Remember that you are giving them to the service of Jesus Christ. Remember that your prayers and Christian training are now to bring forth their gospel results in the place where they are most needed.

When my father, then a young country minister, was called to a large city church, my grandfather, David Talmage, protested against his going. He said, DeWitt, you are doing well now in your little country church. Why do you go into that large city, where your influence will be swallowed up, and no one ever hear from you again?" But DeWitt Talmage answered, "Father, I must go; it is my duty to go: I believe God is calling me to that field. And if I go in his name, he will bless me." God did bless him. And so farmers and farmer's wives, God will also bless and is blessing the Christian work of your Christian children in the same way, if he has called them to live in a great city.

Palm Sunday emphasizes the fact that the easiest way to capture a city for God, is to go after the masses. Who are the masses? They are the most of today. They are the common people, who for the most part fill our churches. And yet, they are the common people who today, if they are only roused with holy enthusiasm, can conquer this old world for Christ. They can do it as easily as the common people who came out to greet Jesus on Palm Sunday, made the Pharisees and the High Priest's hirelings at that time afraid to lift their threatening fingers, or to do Jesus any harm. To-day, that religious organization which is most spiritually influential for Jesus, is the church which appeals to the employee as well as to the employer, to the poor man's but as well as to the rich man's palace; to the artisan, and the mechanic, and the laborer, as well as to the merchant prince, the capitalist, or the man dressed in broadcloth.

Oh, the infinite influence of the common people! If we could only, by the power of the Holy Spirit, enlist the common people to fight for Jesus Christ, under the standard of the Cross, there would be no doubt as to the ultimate condition of our nation. When Robert G. Ingersoll was a candidate for the gubernatorial chair of Illinois, he was defeated for the nomination. Why? Because, if he had been nominated, every church pulpit would have become a political rostrum. Every little meeting-house, and prayer-meeting room would have been filled with Christian workers, who would have worked and voted against him. Thus, if we could only inspire the great mass of the church members, made up of the common people, with a holy enthusiasm for Christ, it would mean no political agitation. It would mean the enthronement of the nation. Then an Christian would vote for a candidate unless he emphatically stated he would use all in his power to drive out the Satanic dominion. It would mean the purification of the home and of the church. The heart of the common people was stirred when it was moved. To arouse that it was during that Jesus passed the most of his earthly ministry; they were the first to recognize him; from them came the first members of his church, and it is with feelings of gratitude to them that we remember that it was they who gave to our Lord the only public welcome and acclamation that he ever received.

But Palm Sunday also throws into our captured city the sorrow of Easter dawn, as well as it overshadows our heavens with the dark clouds of the Crucifixion of "Black Friday." Palm Sunday promises unto us, "You may have tribulation, and bear your burdens and suffer your death as Jesus Christ had to suffer and die. But you may also live Christ, have your resurrection and reunion and ultimate triumph." This was the reason why the ancient Christians placed of the palm leaf upon their sanctuaries. This was the reason why they also had the palm as the symbol of martyrdom. It meant victory. Victory in the name of the Lord Jesus. Victory over the world. Victory over sin. It meant the kind of victory that St. John described in Revelation, when he cried out, "After this I beheld, and lo a great multitude which no man could number, stood before the throne and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands." Chrysostom called an athlete who had won a great number of games as "a man of many palms." So today, as we see the palm branches thrown under the feet of Christ, we know that they are to become symbols. They may remind us of the palms of many heavenly rewards.

What a happy day that will be when Christ greets his loved ones in heavenly lands, and gives to them their victorious palms! The palms of reward for all their past sufferings, and trials, and sorrows, which were undergone for him. When Agrippa, the grandson of Herod the Great, expressed a wish that Caligula might some day sit upon the Roman throne, Emperor Tiberius was angered. He threw Agrippa into a loathsome dungeon. There he languished, week after week, and month after month. But when the passing time did place Caligula upon the throne, then the new emperor went in person, and opened the prisoner's gates. He robed Agrippa in royal purple. He gave him a palace in which to live. He took his heavy iron chains which had once manacled the prisoner's feet, and weighed them. And for every heavy link of iron, he gave to him a heavy link of gold. Our Divine Master, on that happy day of the rewardings in heaven, will give to each one of his suffering children greater compensation than ever Emperor Caligula gave to the ragged prisoner, Agrippa. Jesus will clothe us in white, not only the symbol of victory, but of purity. He will make the jewels of our crown out of the crystallized tears we have shed in his service. And in each one of our hands Christ will place a palm; the palm of victory, the palm of never ending joy. Oh, Christian brother, do not worry because you have to suffer for Jesus. It means a palm; a waving, trimphant palm.

The palm is such a suggestive symbol of victory, that to-day I would that we might have had this pulpit decorated with palm branches as an object lesson. Then, after the service is over, I would have you, members of this congregation, each take a palm leaf home, as the priests allow the worshipers to do this day in Catholic Churches. Then, after you have gone to the quietude of your own homes, I would have had to look long and earnestly at that palm leaf, and decide what you are to do. Would you accept the palm leaf as the Grecian athlete received it, merely as a symbol of worldly victory, or would you accept it as a symbol of a heavenly triumph? Accept it in the same spirit that the Christian martyr, who was about to be torn into pieces in the Roman Colosseum, accepted it. But, as we have set a palm leaf here for you to take home as an object lesson, I ask you here and now to decide the question of your life. How will you deal with your worldly conquests? Have your efforts won for you the palm of wealth? Have they won for you the palm of political power, or popularity? Then, can you cast them down at Christ's feet and pledge yourselves and all you are and have to his service? If you can do this, you shall become a spiritual palm tree, planted by the River of Life, a palm which will blossom on earth, and which will some day be transplanted to come to full fruition in the heavenly gardens of the New Jerusalem.

An Easter Song

O HEART, to-day be blithe and gay,
Forget thine ancient sorrow,
Go singing on thy happy way,
Nor dread the coming morrow.
For he who slept in Joseph's tomb,
As in a dreary prison;
Hath outward stept where lilies bloom,
Our Saviour hath arisen!
When on the Cross, in pain and loss,
His life for us was given;
Such glory dimmed for mortal dross—
Our very hearts were riven.
When broken in the garden tomb
His body lay before us,
No rift of gladness pierced the gloom
That hung its curtain o'er us.

But as He said, three days are sped,
Most true, that sweet evangel,
And where He lay, at feet and head,
Lo, keepeth watch an angel.
Why seek the living in the tomb?
Hath not the Lord arisen?
Henceforth for Christ the King make room!
Proclaim, the Lord is Risen!
O lift a song, where thousands throng,
O sing, though life be lonely,
For praises to our Lord belong,
We praise our Saviour only.
For He who slept in Joseph's tomb,
All angels tell the story!
Hath outward stept where lilies bloom
And upward to His glory.

HIS WEALTH A BLESSING TO OTHERS

THE STREETS OF LE CLAIRE — MR. N. O. NELSON — A COTTAGE AT LE CLAIRE

WHAT one man may do toward helping his fellow-men, who have been less fortunate than himself, is well illustrated in the career of Mr. N. O. Nelson, of St. Louis, who has just added to his great industrial profit-sharing community at LeClaire, Ill., a university, to educate the children of the poor, while at the same time he gives them work in his factories. Men and women who leave his community in the future will be equipped in hand and brain, if they have the ability to profit by the training they receive.

For several years, LeClaire has attracted attention as a profit-sharing community. Mr. Nelson owns a large plumbing works there, and employs two hundred workmen, who live adjacent to the factories. He also lives at LeClaire with his family, and he has built up around him one of the most entertaining and contented communities of working men to be found anywhere. Now he is adding to it a large educational training school, which has been placed in charge of the non-sectarian church-workers of St. Louis. It will accommodate one thousand pupils.

Mr. Nelson is in warm sympathy with his people, and lives their life and grants every demand that he believes he would desire if he were in their ranks. He has never had a strike, despite the fact that he employs hundreds of workingmen in his establishments at LeClaire, Ill., Bessemer, Ala., and Mound City, Ill. In private he is as plain and unassuming as any of his workingmen. He has passed the middle age, but his face always wears a happy smile, and the hand he extends to greet one gives a hearty welcome. He never refuses to aid in a worthy cause. He has given a great deal of money toward relieving the poor in St. Louis, but privacy in benefactions is one of the conditions he always imposes.

He established the colony at LeClaire in 1890, acquiring 125 acres of land. Commodious factories were erected, surrounded by flower gardens, trees and shrubbery. The buildings were of brick, and climbing plants were set around the walls, so that in summer the sides of the factories are covered with shrubbery and the place looks like a botanical garden. Ample provision is made for cleanliness in the factories, even bath-rooms being provided, so that every night after their duties were complete in the work-room, the workmen could take a plunge and feel ready to enjoy a pleasant evening with their families. An immense dining-room is located in every one of the buildings, and here the workmen bring their luncheon and spread their meal, as if they were at home.

A GROUP OF CHILDREN UNDER TRAINING IN THE MODEL VILLAGE

THE WORKSHOPS AT LE CLAIRE

LeClaire has always been a profit-sharing community. In 1886, Mr. Nelson first commenced the profit-sharing system. Union wages are paid to the workmen. No restrictions are imposed, no agreements are required. A fair rate of interest is taken for the use of the capital Mr. Nelson has tied up in the colony, and the balance of the profit is divided among the workmen. From 1886 to 1895, the dividends on wages varied from five to eleven per cent. Now Mr. Nelson has commenced paying dividends in stock, as he is planning to retire from the control of the factory in his old age, and wishes his workmen to take charge.

LeClaire's streets are wide and clean; the houses are all owned by the families who live in them, and no renters are allowed. All the citizens are interested in keeping the town in good condition. There is no mayor, no governing board. Very little interest is taken in politics.

Everything is done that will tend to elevate the minds of the population. Boys are taught in the village school, and at a proper age go to work, while the girls are urged to remain at home. It is an intensely religious community, though no particular sect predominates. Most of the citizens attend the evangelical church established there. In winter, there are entertainments for the young folk and lectures for the older ones. In summer, the children are provided with tennis courts and baseball grounds, and in winter they have bowling alleys and skating ponds. Everything is done to bring wholesome amusements to their doors, so that they will not seek the wild carousal of the city, eighteen miles away.

Since Mr. Nelson has opened the industrial school at LeClaire, the St. Louis philanthropic societies are turning over to his care many of the poor waifs and outcasts of the city. He takes them and puts them into clean clothes, and surrounds them with new conditions. They are made to work in the factories during vacation, in payment for tuition and board. The work is not difficult, but it keeps their hands busy, and teaches them a trade, fitting them to cope with the world, should they go out into it again. No student who enters is compelled to remain.

Mr. Nelson considers the management of his colony at LeClaire in the light of a sacred duty he owes as the possessor of wealth, for he regards wealth as a trusteeship. He is using his millions to aid others to climb the ladder to independence and happiness.

AN IVY-COVERED FACTORY

A BEAUTIFUL OCCASION

ANY one whose privilege it was to stand on the platform on the evening of Feb. 28th, in Mation Hall, New York, and look down on the sea of people singing below, will never forget the sight. The occasion was a Fair for the benefit of the Finland famine sufferers, and as many of the Finland people resident in New York as could crowd into the hall, were present. Among them were beautiful matrons and fair young girls, wearing the picturesque national costume, stalwart and fine-looking men, some of whom wore the colors of Finland in broad sashes of pale blue and pure white ribbon: blue for the sky, white for the snow of their native land. When the Finland music was given, sung by the Finnish Good Templars' Society, the enthusiasm of the assembly burst all bounds. Men, women and little roly-poly children joined in the chorus. At the singing of the Finnish National Anthem many women had tears standing in their eyes as they sang. There was beautiful singing, too, by the Swedish Musical Society, and the whole affair, so creditable to those who, with great effort and painstaking, arranged it, was a side-light on the cosmopolitan character of our great city of New York. And, too, it showed how true and steady burns love for the fatherland in those who make a new home on our shores. Those Finlanders had loved ones in the old land—a land so ancient and so grand in its history. Their thoughts went over the sea to the men and women and little ones suffering at home. They longed to help them in their hour of need, as also do we of America, who have never yet been deaf or unresponsive to any cry of want or pain from any quarter of the globe.

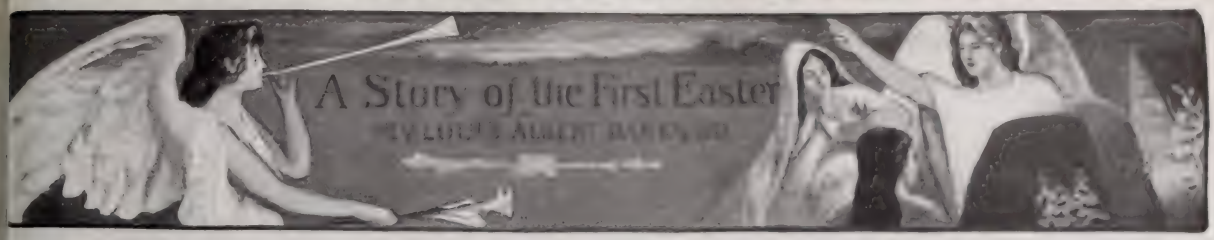
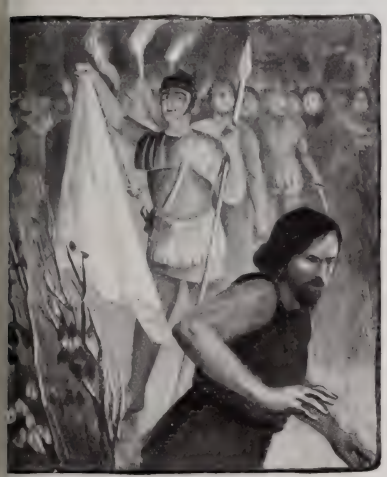
HOW JOHN MARK REGAINED HIS COURAGE



IN the year 33, not far from the Garden of Gethsemane, lived Mary Mark, a widow, with one son. She was one of the early friends of Jesus, and her house was a frequent meeting-place for his disciples. It was not uncommon for them to come there, to talk matters over quietly in any time of trouble, and Mary Mark's hospitable ard was always open to them.

On that dark night of the arrest of Jesus



"HE FLED THRO' THE DARKNESS TO HIS MOTHER'S HOUSE"

the Garden of Gethsemane, when Judas etrayed his Lord with a kiss into the nds of his enemies, and Jesus had given e hint to his disciples to leave him to s captors to work their will; James and hn, who, with Peter, had been with the laster in the garden, came in great haste nd excitement knocking at the door of lary Mark. The moment the door was pened, they burst in, crying out in agony: t is all over! Jesus has been arrested, nd is even now in the hands of the fficers!"

Now John Mark, a young fellow just ushing up into manhood, had been very ond of Jesus. John was of a temperaent which is quite common. He had a ertain ready enthusiasm for every new ersonality or cause that appealed to his ncy. He was impulsive. He leaped uick to a decision, and rushed at once to e performance, but he was not steadast. He was likely to give up and be asily discouraged on meeting opposition. he knocking at the door aroused John ut of sleep, and startled him up in bed. hen, when he heard the cry of the disiples, and the statement that Christ had een arrested, he rushed forth before them, lad only in his night-dress, saying exitedly:

"Why did you leave him?" And beore they could explain, he rushed out into he night, hurrying away to where they ad last seen the Lord, determined to folow him up, and stand by him. He came apidly, running to where he saw the light f the torches of those who had charge of esus, and pushed his way close to the laster. The guards, seeing his evident xcitement, and expecting an attempt at escue, turned on him to take him in harge. At this, John Mark's courage beegan to ooze out, and as the guards had only caught hold of his outer garment, he slipped out of it, and leaving it in their hands, fled through the darkness to his mother's house. When he came slipping in, the others, despite their sorrow, could not help but smile at his discomfiture, as he, with abashed and sorrowful face, slipped away to bed. But later, Mary went to his room, and, kneeling by his side, talked long with him of what to her was a great sorrow, the lack of steadfastness of purpose in her son.

The tragic and terrible days had passed over Jerusalem. Jesus of Nazareth had appeared before Pilate and Herod, had been crowned with thorns by the soldiers, and scourged by the orders of Pilate. He had fainted under his cross, at the door of the judgment hall, and the immortal scenes of Calvary had been stamped forever on the canvas of human history. Joseph and Nicodemus, broken-hearted and ashamed that they should have denied to Jesus the testimony of their faith while he lived, had joined with the faithful women in taking the body of Jesus and laying it in Joseph's new tomb in the garden. To please the politicians, Pilate had had the grave, which was closed by a huge stone, sealed with the insignia of Rome, and a company of soldiers had been set there to keep guard, and make sure that Jesus remained in the grave.

As the time drew near when Jesus had prophesied his resurrection, the women who loved him most became very nervous and anxious, and on the last night before the first Easter, they came together as with one accord to pray, and talk, and hope, and fear. As yet, fear was in the ascendancy. But there was in their hearts a glimmer of hope. A good woman hopes for and believes in many things for which she has no proof to offer or logical argument to present.

This was the first great woman's prayer meeting of the Christian era. Mary, the mother of Jesus, was there, the revered leader, to whom every one turned with deference. And as the long hours of the night passed, she opened her heart to her sisters, and told over again the sweet story of Bethlehem, of the shepherds, of the wise men who came from the East, of the flight into Egypt, of the days in the Nazareth carpenter shop, of the visit to Jerusalem when Jesus was lost, a boy in the temple. These and many other things she talked about, recalling incidents from the treasury of her mother's heart, and telling them as only a mother's love could make possible.

After she had talked a long time, Mary said: "Sisters, I cannot believe that this is to be the last. Some great change is to come, I am sure. Jesus would not have told John to care for me if he himself was to remain as before. But I feel to the depths of my soul that something is going to happen, and that my dear son, who has always shown so much of the presence of God with him, will not remain in the grave, and yet, while I thus feel, it is all mysterious, and my heart is full of fear."

Then Mary Magdalene spoke of the wonderful work of Jesus for her. With tenderness and humility, she told how her life had been tortured by wicked spirits, and how marred and hurt she had been by sin, until Jesus passed by and looked in her face. Said she:

"I can never forget that first look when I saw his eyes resting on mine. They seemed to read my very soul, and know the worst that was there, and yet there was nothing in them that turned from me, or looked contempt. I felt that here was one who could help me, and save me, and from that very hour I began to get the victory over myself, and the evil spirits were banished from my heart and life. And oh!" exclaimed Mary Magdalene, "I cannot believe that this is to be the last. Surely he who could cast out devils, and work such a change in me, is not to lie in the grave. And yet it is all so dark!"

Then a widow spoke. She had come up from the town of Nain, attracted, as had been many other women, by the knowledge that something of serious import was about to happen to him whom they loved. She was a woman of quiet dignity, and she spoke with sadness, and yet there was a thrill of hope in her every tone.

"Sisters," she said, "no one here, unless it be the mother of Jesus, has more reason to love him and believe in him than I. I was on the way to the grave with my son. The last staff of my broken life had been taken from me. It was a bright, sunshiny day, but to me it was blacker than the darkest midnight. My boy, my only child, was being borne to the tomb. I was not looking at anyone, nor anywhere. I was walking along with my head down, weeping, when suddenly I heard a voice, a voice full of authority, and yet the sweetest, tenderest voice my ears have ever heard. The word was, 'Stop!' I wondered who it could be. If it had not been for the tone, I should have been grieved, thinking an enemy sought to do me injury by halting the funeral procession of my son; but the tone thrilled my soul, and I looked up, and saw Jesus. Oh, the glory of that face! the depth and tenderness of his eyes. He looked on me a moment, and then took my son by his cold, dead hand, and said, 'Young man, I say unto thee, arise!' It was like a flash of lightning! Every one about the bier felt a thrill go through them, and, trembling with life, my son sat up on his bier, and turned to me in smiling wonder. I fell on his neck rejoicing, and when I turned to thank him who had brought us this great blessing, he was gone. And now, sisters, how can it be that he who brought back my son to life, shall be himself held by the bonds of death? It is all strange, but somehow I feel to-night something of the thrill that I felt that day by the bier of my child, and something great, methinks, is going to happen. We shall see our Lord's face again!"

And so they talked one after another; Martha told over again the story of the resurrection of Lazarus. And Mary Mark brought her quiet word of love and sympathy. The night passed in prayer and testimony, in hope and fear, in love and tears. Just as the day dawned, they said, one to another, "Let us go to the grave, and take with us precious perfumes, and make sweet his body while we wait and pray and hope."

All the world knows what the women found at the sepulchre. How the stone was rolled away, and the angel sitting upon it, and the message which the angels sent to the disciples. Very soon afterwards, these women scattered to their homes to tell their friends the wondrous news of the resurrection of Jesus. Mary Mark came home that morning with her face all aglow. As she came in at the door, John Mark, who was waiting for his breakfast, started up at the sight of her face, and exclaimed:

"Why, mother, where have you been that you should look so happy? It is a long time since I have seen your face with much gladness in it. Tell me, mother, what is it?"

And as they drew about the board for the morning meal, Mary Mark looked into the faces of her son and her guests, and said with tremulous voice: "There is reason for my gladness. The Lord is risen!"

If a bomb-shell had been exploded in that quiet home, it could not have created more excitement. The men leaped to their feet. John Mark exclaimed:

"Mother, how do you know? Have you seen him?"

Then Mary repeated all the story of the night and of the morning, and the message of the angels.

Among Mary's guests that morning was Cleopas, who was also a friend of Jesus. After breakfast, for which no one had seemed to care, Cleopas said to John Mark, "Let us walk out to Emmaus, to my home. The long walk will give us an opportunity to think, and talk, and reason about this matter, which is so strange and wonderful to us."

Nothing could have suited better young Mark's mood. He was a vigorous, live young fellow, and he felt how impossible it was to content himself in any ordinary duty at such a time. So they set out on the long walk to Emmaus.

The story John's mother had brought to them had filled them with wonder, but

"THEY STOOD BEFORE THE DOOR OF CLEOPAS"

they had not found it possible to enter into her joy. The story she told seemed impossible, and while they did not doubt her truthfulness, they feared she had

SWEDEN WELCOMES THE RELIEF

The King and Queen Personally Thank America Through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

HAVING finished up work in the Northland, among the famine-stricken Finns and Swedes, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief party is now homeward bound. Every centre of suffering has been visited, the methods of existing relief work have been observed with watchful interest, and the assurance has been received that the generous gifts of Christian America, which were distributed through the native Relief Committees in both countries, have been of the greatest service in mitigating the suffering.

The cablegrams which appear in this issue, relative to the visit of our Relief party to Sweden, show how greatly needed was the help afforded to the country and how deeply appreciative its rulers are of America's kindness. Both the Committees in Helsingfors and Stockholm have cabled their official thanks through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the American relief, and to Dr. Klopsch in person many representative Finlanders and Swedes have expressed in the warmest terms their gratitude for the kindness that prompted our nation to extend help to the multitudes of the famine-stricken in the distant Northland.

THE CITY OF STOCKHOLM, THE CAPITAL OF SWEDEN

In the Lower House of the Rigsdag (the Swedish Parliament) at Stockholm, Minister of Agriculture Odelberg stated, a few days ago, that not less than £51,220 sterling was urgently needed to relieve distress in the northern districts of Sweden. Toward this need, American donors, through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, had contributed £5,560 sterling, which had been transferred to the Relief Committee by Dr. Klopsch. Whether the Swedish government would grant state aid to the sufferers he did not know. It was gratifying to know that the Swedes in America did not forget their fatherland.

It will doubtless interest the thousands of readers who have had a personal share in this work of relief in the Northland, to learn how the people of those unfortunate countries regard the splendid generosity of Christian America toward the famine-stricken. The Finnish daily paper Uusi Suometar, of Helsingfors, Finland, in its issue of February 27th, says:

Never before, in times of need, did our poor land receive such aid from a foreign country as now, through the energetic efforts of Dr. Klopsch and the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The sums sent by him to the Central Relief Committee here are no longer counted by the tens, but in hundreds of thousands. They bear witness of the warm sympathy that is felt in America for our poor, unfortunate people, and are an evidence of the grandly humane activities dwelling among that great, energetic and free nation, compelling it to stretch out its helping hand, not only to its bleeding neighbors, but also to the remotest corners on the other side of the ocean, as is now the case.

Dr. Klopsch has come to see personally how matters are here, not to rely solely upon the information he receives from the Central Relief Committee. He is going to visit the regions of distress himself.

The journey will enable him to become familiar with the distress prevailing in our country. We wish our welcome visitors a safe journey; they are giving up all accommodations to which they have been accustomed, and going into the interior of the country to accomplish noble ends. We cannot give them any other reward than our most heartfelt thanks, but they will get most satisfaction from the knowledge that their work will bring relief and comfort to thousands of Finnish homes, where it will be long remembered.

The Helsingfors Posten, Mar. 3, contained the following:

Dr. Klopsch has, through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S magnificent gifts, which was made to the Central Relief Committee with full confidence and unconditionally, added another to a list of unique benevolence. The very considerable support our Committee has received, through the gifts from America, will enable us to carry into execution the carefully planned relief work much sooner and more completely than otherwise would have been the case. The Finnish nation's warmest sympathies follow Dr. Klopsch on his journey into the stricken districts. It is to be hoped, that during his travels in the sombre North, he may get an opportunity to realize, that the help he has brought, will confer blessings and inspire new hopes among our poor people.

In another issue, Uusi Suometar says:

Dr. Klopsch has transferred 100,000 Finnish marks to the Central Relief Committee for the famine-stricken in Finland, which amount, together with the money he remitted before, is 250,000 Finnish marks.

A quarter of a million marks has been remitted during a short time for the starving in Finland. With the famine-stricken, we feel deep thankfulness about this great gift to our countrymen, which feeling brings evidence to the mind of every Finn of that warm sympathy, which the American nation has shown to us.

We hope that Dr. Klopsch, during this journey, will be convinced that he has undertaken the work, which indeed is deserving of all his great efforts, and that, when he returns home he can assure his compatriots that their generous gifts came to the greatest need.

It is true that in a land like ours, famine and misery are not to be found in the same measure as in India, and some other countries where he has carried help; and it is true, also, that our State has taken up great works—we need only mention the railroad from Tisalmi to Kajana—by which a great number of people receive their living. But the Americans, they turn off from the high roads to the interior parts of the country, where there is little land cultivated, will meet there more misery than they could expect, which the collected donations have been insufficient to help. They will see there hovels where the bark bread chopper is the principal household implement; rocky lands, whereon the peeled bare pines grimace with bare ribs and trenches where the food mill grinds straws to make bread. There they, perhaps, will feel that they are accomplishing their mission to these poor of the wilderness, where so many families are in misery, so many helpless widows and orphans in rags, who can tell them a tale about father or brother, their only helper, but who went to America and left his relatives to struggle again a harder destiny.

While there is famine in Finland, the famine in Russian Karel (Karjala) is twice as great. And to relieve the famine there, little or nothing is done.

The newspaper Uusi Savo of Kuopio, says:

Yesterday, March 5, there went by Kuopio toward the north, the American, Dr. Louis Klopsch, who through his newspaper, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has collected large sums for the famine-stricken in Finland. By this splendid help has the American philanthropic mission undertaken to lift up the heavy burden which, by lack of food, has depressed innumerable Finnish homes during the winter in northern Finland. Probably we can now put into effect many plans for famine relief work, which, owing to scantiness of money, have till now been impossible. The American traveler will continue his journey to Tisalmi and will visit the northern villages of the district, where the famine is most painful, and where he will glance into the forest cabins and the small farms. We hope that our American friend would give to the Russian Karel also some help. There the famine is most cruel and the people have no alms to give them. The thankfulness of the whole Finnish nation follows the benefactors along their journey.

The Hufondstadsblater, Helsingfors, says:

Great suffering prevails in the remote hamlets of Kittila. People walk around from house to house, poorly clad. The numerous children are in dire want of clothing

SWEDEN'S MONARCH GRATEFUL

(Special Cable Dispatch to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD)

STOCKHOLM, March 23.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief party consisting of Dr. Louis Klopsch and Mr. Gilson Willets, arrived in Stockholm from Finland yesterday. American flags were displayed on public buildings, the American Legation hoisting for the first time in its history the American flag for a private citizen.

To-day at noon the Relief party lunched at the Legation. Minister Thomas, in a short address, said this great charity had done more to bind Sweden and America closely together, than anything that had been accomplished in forty years.

At two o'clock the unusual distinction was granted of a special audience of half an hour in the private chambers of the king and queen, who were together.

Their majesties expressed their heartfelt thanks to the great-hearted American people for their kindness to the suffering people of Sweden. They hoped we would contradict the statements that the American reports were exaggerated. Both were moved to tears, when told that there were many thousands of individual contributors to the relief work.

The king said he was sure the Swedes made good American citizens, reflecting credit alike on themselves and their adopted and mother countries. He hoped the visitors liked Sweden. He was proud, he said, to be king of such a country and such a people.

At the queen's invitation, the Relief party visited a hospital founded by Her Majesty.

The Relief Committee Sends Thanks

STOCKHOLM, March 24.

To THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York:

The Swedish sufferers desire to thank the American people for their magnificent relief.

nd food. For many places no food can be gotten for the attle. When a sufferer the other day applied to the comunity for assistance, he received about two kilograms of our for a family of seven children. One father complained hat he had six children at home, but not a vestige of proisions in the house, and he had in vain been looking for ome work, by which he might earn enough to keep his little nes from starving.

From America, the community has received 1,000 marks, hich stayed the distress for only a very short while.

Mr. Sev. Leino, distributor of relief to the helpless, rrites the Uusi Suometar, as ollows, concerning the need at Hyrynsalmi and other places:

After three weeks' investigation of he famine-stricken regions, I can ssuredly state that the reports in apers of the needs have not been s graphic as the conditions really re. Evidences of this are seen at Hyrynsalmi and Suomissalmi, where eventy to eighty persons are sufferng with the swelling sickness (it inates the flesh), and many have aleady perished there of this sickness. This is the result of unwholesome ood, according to the testimony of hysicians. Those still appearing ealthy, tremble with feebleness. The local relief committee at Hyrnsalmi is doing commendable work, mitigating the misery; but even more ffective work is necessary there han is now in progress. Soon these withered images of human beings will enter the realms of death, unless the aid is increased. In the pring, the hardships will be more intense, because what work there now is, will end, and the number of the helpless will be increased. Wages have been so small, and the means of subsistence so high, that nothing could be saved or laid by for the proverbial rainy day, when there will be no more of such work, even with the best will.

I hope that the Central Committee will work henceforth with all energy, for the calamity is great in these so-called "hunger regions." I also hope that individual donators will continue their blessed work.

Dr. Julius N. Reuter, who accompanied THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Expedition throughout, says that but for the assistance of the Relief Committee, which was so largely aided by American gifts, there would have been untold suffering. The Committee now has branches in every village and parish, and every case of suffering is attended to as soon as discovered. Potatoes and milk are scarce, but the Committee supplies sufficient bread, peas and salt fish, and exacts labor in payment for the help wherever possible, so as to avoid pauperizing the people.

All the late reports received concur in the general statement that the situation, in Finland at least, is greatly improved. To maintain this improvement, it will be necessary to keep up the relief work throughout the spring, and this the Committee is prepared to do.

Secretary J. H. Jasberg, of the Finnish Central Relief Committee of the United States, writes from Hancock, Mich., to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

The American people have opened their hearts, and are doing a great deal towards relieving the distress amongst our suffering countrymen in the old world; but I take the liberty of saying that which is also a fact—that without your paper and its readers first starting the great work we would not have been able to accomplish anywhere near as much in this country, outside of our own Finnish people; and on that account I, personally and in behalf of our people here and at home, take pleasure in thanking you from the bottom of my heart for your great work of relief. I hope that the Finnish people, at some time or other in the future, may be able to partly recompense your readers for the great assistance given them in their hour of dire need, and that God, who repays all who do good work and assist the poor and needy, will bless you and your paper and its efforts to the last.

The Finnish newspaper Paivalehti, says: "In Suomussalmi, the famine-stricken are in such destitution that the only way to help them, is for the State to send them to the southern part of Finland, or send them to America. The same complaint is heard from several districts in Northern Finland, but the realization of the latter idea, if not impossible, would cause enormous emigration. In any case, immense quantities of food are needed.

In several districts, including Pavlyva, Kaulampira, Kuusala and Lentiala, small-pox has appeared as a sequel to existing famine conditions.

At many of the soup kitchens established by the Central Relief Committee for the starving schoolchildren of the interior parishes, clothing is being supplied to the half-naked little ones.

In Kolari, in Northern Finland, had it not been for the relief supplied by the charitable, hundreds of the starving would have perished. The food reached them in time to save many lives.

The Dowager Empress of Russia has contributed 10,000 marks for famine relief, and the Grand Duke Michael has contributed 2,000 roubles for the same purpose.

The following letter from a Western reader, shows how deep and practical is the sympathy for Finland and Sweden:

BOULDER, COLO., March 22.

CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

I enclose check for $400 for relief of famine sufferers in Northern Europe. If, as I find may be the case from the marked paragraph on enclosed proof sheet, my subscription is too late to be of practical use, you will kindly return my check. Do not mention my name.

The worst will come in April and May, when the spring thaws will render the sufferers inaccessible, even by snow shoes.

This gift, with all others that are sent for the famine work in the Northland, will be forwarded to the native relief committees. All contributions will be acknowledged in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

AMERICA'S GIFT TO SWEDEN AND NORWAY

Special Cable Dispatch to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

ST. PETERSBURG, March 28.—"The Christian Herald" Relief party reached the Russian capital yesterday.

Before leaving Stockholm, Dr. Klopsch, having made full inquiry concerning the famine in North Sweden and Norway, transferred to the Central Committee from the Relief Fund, 100,000 KRONEN ($26,800) for Swedish relief, and 20,000 KRONEN ($5,350) for relief operations in Norway.

The American party had an hour's interview with Prince and Princess Bernadotte in Stockholm. Both expressed themselves as profoundly grateful for America's kindness. They sent salutations to Christian America, with the message "Hold fast the faith of the Scriptures."

The Prince and Princess may visit the United States this year.

Easter

VERY significant is the coincidence of the celebration of Easter at this season of the year. Unlike the Christmas festival, as to which there must always be a doubt whether the event it celebrates occurred at that season, the Easter festival is conclusively identified by the Gospel narratives with the spring. It was at the Passover time that Jesus was arrested, crucified and rose again, and that feast was always held soon after the vernal equinox. There is, therefore, historical authority for holding at this season, when all nature is breaking forth into new life, and the trees are putting forth new leaves, and the dead seeds are sending shoots through their earth covering, the festival that speaks to us of life from the dead. All nature seems to be in sympathy with the spiritual joy which fills the devout heart, at the thought which Jesus left us as an invaluable legacy: "I am he that liveth and was dead, and behold I am alive for evermore and have the keys of death." It is as if God had specially arranged for our benefit, that this festival, which leads us to try to grasp anew the great truth of the resurrection, and when we are asking ourselves with natural incredulity: "If a man die shall he live again?" should come at a time when the doubter has only to turn his eyes to the natural world, and read there, in the new life abounding everywhere, a reproof to his doubt. It says to him in sweetest song: "That which thou sowest is not quickened, except it die," and it leaves him to apply the lesson to his own perplexing problem. The springing shoots that speak to us of the dead seeds hidden in the earth; the butterfly on the wing, that has broken from the chrysalis, bid us take heart and believe the promise that in our case "It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption; it is sown in weakness; it is raised in power."

We need to follow apostolic example in making the resurrection of Jesus prominent in our preaching and teaching. It is the keystone of our faith. We are often told that the divinity of Jesus precludes us from building on his resurrection an argument for our own. We are reminded that the fact that the God-man having risen from the dead, is no evidence that ordinary man will rise. But we have yet to learn that the Christian is, in that sense, an ordinary man. He who has been born again is a partaker of the divine nature. Christ in him is the hope of glory. The spirit of Christ so lives in him, that it is not his own life that he lives, but one on which death has no power. The life of the vine is in the branches, and so for ourselves and for the loved ones who sleep in Jesus, we are justified in cherishing the confidence that, because he lives, we shall live also. So let us keep our Easter with joyful hearts, assured that over the last enemy, God has given us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.

A Christless Religion

OUR esteemed contemporary, the New York Sun, has called attention, in a timely and suggestive editorial, to the extraordinary character of recent utterances by certain prominent clergymen in New York and other American cities. Some of these illustrate, in a marked degree, the modern tendency to a loose theology, and a grave departure from recognized standards of religious belief.

"Christianity," declares Dr. Heber Newton, of Stanford University, "is not exclusive, but inclusive of all religions,"—a misconception too obvious to need refutation. "Religion," says a well-known New York clergyman of ultra-progressive views, "does not ask you to be a Catholic or a Protestant, a Jew or a Christian; but simply that you do justly, love mercy, walk reverently with God." This definition was old even in the days of Moses and of Micah; indeed, it is the latter's own language. "A Christian," says another minister, "is a pure, honest, unselfish man,"—a definition which, if meant to be complete, would be quite as appropriate from the lips of a pagan as from those of a modern Christian preacher—and he adds that it (Christianity), has "brought into the religion of to-day no new thing that was not in the Old Testament, except a clearer revelation and a freedom from the errors of the Old Testament."

This is Christianity with Christ left out. In ignoring or rejecting the essential truths of the Christian faith, these misleading teachers have substituted for the vital, living Gospel, a doctrine which is a strange, inert mixture of Moses, Confucius and the anthropomorphists (who ascribed to Deity a form and attributes that were purely human, and held God to be the manifestation of physical energy). "I am the Light of the world," said Christ, "he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness;" but these teachers are heading toward the outer darkness of the spiritual wilderness. Blind themselves, how can they lead or enlighten others? Teaching the moralities and an impersonal God, is dangerously near to pantheism, pure and simple.

Again: they teach the "saving doctrine" of good works. So did the ancients and the prophets; while He who is the central figure of all the prophecies, God's only begotten Son and the world's Redeemer, declared "no man cometh unto the Father but by me." These teachers point the inquiring soul to a hazy and indefinite future, indistinct and elusive as the mirage that deceives the weary traveler; but there was no uncertain note in the utterance of the Divine Teacher, who, while He lifted the curtain and brought life and immortality to light, declared, "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth on me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth on me shall never die!"

"Do your duty," further say the latter-day moralists, "and you will come out all right." No need of a Saviour, in their plausible theology! No need of Him who came to save a lost world, and, through His life and atoning sacrifice, to redeem the race and set it right with God. No need of a Gospel which has brought countless multitudes into a true and harmonious attitude toward their Creator, and which remains to-day as the world's brightest hope.

Pride of intellect is sometimes permitted to go to extreme lengths in assailing and disparaging the plain, old-fashioned, time-tried Gospel; but in preaching a Christianity without Christ, these moralists have attempted to demonstrate a logical impossibility. What the world needs is not ethical doctrines, nor creeds, but a living Christ; not the memory of a good man who delivered his message to the race, and then passed away, two thousand years ago, but a Divine Saviour, who is to-day as tender, and loving, and helpful to men, and as active in their behalf as when He walked upon the earth; a Christ to whom they may turn in instant appeal, and in whom they have a faith so strong and upholding that it brings them through sorrow and trial triumphant and rejoicing. This is the Christ of the martyrs, of the persecuted, of the redeemed heathen, of the great army of believers throughout the world. And the recognition of this living, loving, spiritualizing, redeeming Christ, constitutes the essential difference between Christianity and all other religions. Even though the "higher critics" should successfully dismember the Old Testament, portion by portion, and a large part of the New—if such a thing were possible—leaving us the living, personal Christ only, Christianity would still stand intact and impregnable.

> On Christ, the solid Rock, we stand;
> All other ground is sinking sand.

In these days of "advanced theology," it is not a new thing for the doctrines of Christianity to be brilliantly derided in the pulpit, in order to please rich and fashionable audiences, who would very likely find the plain truth unpalatable. It is time, however, for the Christian ministry to awaken to the need of combating this pernicious tendency, and to speak out clearly and boldly in refutation of such shallow teaching. Perversion of sacred truths and the discrediting of religious standards may please a few thoughtless minds, but such utterances are a discredit alike to reason and religion, and deserve to be condemned from every loyal pulpit.

The Cruelty of Careless Accusation

A LITTLE girl in New York, the other day, took carbolic acid and ended her life. She left behind her a pitiful little letter to her brother, saying, "I am very sorry to leave you, but what can I do? I never in my life have enjoyed myself. I am always crying." The child was an orphan, and lived, turn-about, with various relatives. Somebody accused her of stealing a pocket-book, and, stung by the stigma, she went out i desperation, bought the stuff that killed her, and wa presently out of the world of humanity.

Probably the little girl was passing through one o those periods of extreme sensitiveness which affec some children acutely and induce depressing morbi ness, yet, those who thoughtlessly blamed her for crime, without being sure of their facts, are in a mea ure responsible for her death. In China, many littl female children, superfluous in the family from birt and knowing themselves to be thus regarded, do thro off the burden of their griefs in suicide. Little girl of eight, nine and ten in the Flowery Kingdom, drow or hang themselves, to escape their daily sufferings a the hands of cruel people, but very seldom does a chil in our happy America resort to such an awful remed for unbearable ills. Our children, as a rule, are o stronger stuff, and endure what they cannot escap with more or less fortitude.

The point, however, for us is that we should neve wrongfully accuse any child; that we should be sure w are right before we assert that a boy or girl has told a untruth, committed an act of disobedience, or take what was the property of somebody else. Peopl should be uniformly just. Most of all should we b just to children, who cannot defend themselves fro those who are older and stronger than they.

The Spirit of the Work

AFTER all, questions of method and material ar outer things, and important as they are, essentia even as they are, and conformed though they may be t the plan of the Great Architect of the Kingdom, ye when he looks upon them there will be no smile on hi face, no light of hope in his eye, no sweet thrilling of hi heart, unless within the true form he sees the true life

The instrument may be all right, but the instrumen is not the music. The most precious Stradivarius violi in existence is nothing but dead wood. As it lies in it case, or as it is held in the cunning, caressing hands o a master, it is nothing but dead wood. The music—wh shall say what that is? It is not the wood of the violin it is not the strings, it is not the bow. What is it Who knows? Who has ever been able to tell us wha the witchery is in the "concord of sweet sounds" Something invisible, intangible, imponderable; some thing that no microscope has discovered, no scales hav weighed. And yet a real thing; the thing without whic the instrument, whatever it be, is a foolish mockery.

Christ listens for the music of the instrument,—th hidden spirit of the work. If that is right, the form wil be sure to please him. And remember, that the spiri of any work of Church or Sunday School, of society o board, is only the spirit of the individuals who do th work. We look at things in the lump; Christ neve does. We generalize from particulars, and often fron too few particulars. Christ concerns himself with noth ing but the particulars; beyond these there is for hin no total, no conclusion. The individual spirit of th workers—that is what is all important.

Niagara Falls Dry

MEN and women in large numbers enjoyed, a few days ago, the unprecedented feat of walking dry-shod over the rocks over which the mighty Niagara pours its torrent. A dispatch the New York press says: "On March 21 the river owed as usual. There was considerable ice passing own stream with the water, but during the night the e floe from Lake Erie grew so heavy, that great mass- s of ice crowded upon the ledges near the head of oat Island, and diverted the water from the American the Canadian channel. Above the ice-jam the water as at least three feet higher than usual, but below the oint where the ice rested on the rocks, there was little ater, and the rocks were quite bare. The greater part f the water in the channel rustled along close to the merican mainland, and so people crossed to Green sland or Goat Island to get out on the river-bed. The at was easy, as well as interesting and attractive. len, women, and children, unmindful of the fact that e river might break through the ice-jam above them, nd carry them over the Falls and to eternity, romped bout the rocks, and gathered ice with great glee, for he possibility of walking over this portion of the river ppeared to intoxicate everybody there with delight.

SCENE AT THE AMERICAN FALLS, WHEN NIAGARA DRIED UP

WALKING OVER THE DRY BED OF THE RAPIDS ABOVE THE AMERICAN FALLS

Copyrighted, 1903, by O. E. Pierce.

Leaving Green Island, the pretty spot that nestles in midstream between Goat Island and the mainland, people were able to walk right straight up the river bed to the head of Goat Island and to plod about over the vast area between the mainland and Goat Island. For centuries untold, Niagara has been the glory of the world as a waterfall, but to-day the awful fascination of the famous fall was gone." Once before, fifty-five years ago, there was a similar jam, but it continued a day only, and few of those who crossed this year remembered it. Looking at the mighty torrent as it ordinarily flows, it would seem impossible to stop it, yet in one night the whole scene was changed, without human intervention. It is no wonder that the ancient patriarch, meditating on the forces of nature, should have prostrated himself in adoration before the Creator, as he said:

By the breath of God ice is given: and the breadth of the waters is straitened. . . . Touching the Almighty we cannot find him out; he is excellent in power and in judgment (Job 37: 10, 23.)

A Daring Rescue

A woman and her child were rescued last week, from a burning house in New York, by a brave policeman. As he was on his way to report for duty at the West Thirtieth Street Station, Policeman Cornelius Willence passed through Twenty-fourth street, and saw an excited crowd gazing at the upper floor of a house. On the fire-escape outside a window on the third floor, a woman and a child were standing, while smoke poured from the windows. The crowd thought the woman was about to jump and called to her to wait for the firemen; but the woman was hysterical, and her danger was increasing every moment. Policeman Willence tried to make his way to her through the burning building, but the fire was so fierce and the smoke so dense that he was driven back. He then tried the house next door, but could not gain admittance. Two doors away he entered and made his way to the roof, thence going over roofs to that of the burning building. It was four stories high. He descended to the third story fire-escape, where the woman and child were. Finding that the woman had fainted, he carried the child to the roof, and then returned and carried up the woman, then a lifeless burden. The crowd saw his brave act, and when the woman and child were both safe on the roof they gave a mighty cheer. Men rightly admire a man who risks his life to save those of others, but how low, comparatively, give a thought to Him who actually laid down his life that they might be saved from everlasting destruction.

For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life (John 3: 16).

To Die for a Totem

There is trouble among the Indians in South Eastern Alaska. Some time ago they decided to hold a potlatch at Sitka. They belong to the great frog tribe, and deputations from groups of that tribe were soon on their way to Sitka from various districts. Among them was a party from Wrangel. They came down in highly decorated canoes, and were dressed in all their glory. On the way to Sitka, a member of the party was taken ill and died. By inexplicable reasoning the Sitka Indians were held responsible for his death, and a demand was made upon them for one hundred and fifty blankets as an indemnity. As they refused to pay, their totem was seized and carried off. An expert carver was employed to make a new totem. After weeks of work it was completed, and a wonderful work it was. Ten feet long, six feet wide, with lips of brass, and enormous glass eyes, it was gay with the colors of the rainbow. It was se. up on a high pole, but not without protest. It is contended that it is a counterfeit totem, and that the Sitka people have no right to a totem until they have paid their indemnity. So the excitement has grown, and now a threat is made to destroy the symbol, and a number of men are determined to destroy it, while others, armed with rifles, stand guard over it night and day. To civilized people it seems incomprehensible that men should attach so much importance to a grotesque symbol. What a change it would work in their lives if they could understand the symbolism of the Cross, and cherish that for it all it implies!

God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world (Gal. 6: 14).

Farthest South

A wonderful story of Antarctic exploration comes from Auckland, New Zealand. The British steamer Morning has returned to that port from its voyage southward, where it went to carry supplies to the explorers who are trying to discover the secret of the South Pole. It found them at McMurdo Bay, Victoria Land, which is much farther south than was expected. They reported that their vessel, the Discovery, entered the ice pack on Dec. 23, 1901. By the following March, the vessel was frozen in, and the crew landed and prepared winter quarters. The temperature was [illegible] sixty-two degrees below zero. In September, which is the closing of the winter in those latitudes, sledge journeys were organized. One of these commanded by Capt. Scott and Dr. Wilson, reaching the eighty-second degree of south latitude, which is nearly three hundred miles farther south than any explorer has ever been. They saw from that point isolated peaks twelve thousand feet high, and high ranges of mountains stretching far away to the horizon. As their dogs had died on the journey, they were obliged to return, dragging their sledge themselves. The arrival of the relief vessel was timely, as provisions were running short. Ample supplies were left with the explorers who expect to resume their journeys by sledge in September next. If men were as much in earnest in their endeavors to learn all about the heavenly world as the explorers are to find out all about this world, how much better and holier our lives would be!

The children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light (Luke 16: 8).

BRIEF NOTES

The Easter Sermon, by Rev. Charles M. Sheldon, will appear in next week's issue.

Canon Farrar, the famous English preacher, is dead. He has been in a feeble condition for several months. His death is a severe loss to the English church.

The number of immigrants who entered Canada last year, exclusive of those who entered from the United States, was 67,379, an increase of 18,230 over the figures of 1901.

A great Christian Endeavor Convention will be held in London on April 10 (Good Friday). The Metropolitan Tabernacle, Rev. Thomas Spurgeon's church, has been secured for it.

The Church Missionary Society recently received an unknown visitor at its office who said he wished to present a check to its funds. He handed the clerk five thousand dollars, but would not give his name.

Japan proposes to be up with the times. It has recently ordered some X ray machines to be used in the Tokio court on the employees whom it suspects of swallowing jewelry and other articles to carry them away.

The highest death rate of any town in the civilized world is said to be that of the city of Mossoul, [illegible] per 1,000. [illegible] 2,000 feet above sea level, but in spite of this fact the [illegible] average makes the mortality very great.

Dr. Torrey and Mr. Alexander, who have been holding meetings in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dundee, etc., propose spending the summer in America, and returning to England in September for a great mission in London next October.

A prominent native journal in India, referring to the introduction of the Bible in the schools, says: "The Bible, if made the centre of India's religious thought, would work out the moral regeneration of the land. And that is the end to be desired more than all else."

The proposal to add at least ten per cent. to Christian Endeavor members before the Convention week of July 5 is meeting with great energy. New York and Massachusetts have each organized twenty-nine new societies in twenty days. The Pennsylvania follows them closely with an increase of [illegible].

Miss Minnie L. Collins, of Calcutta, asks us to state that she has received the following sums for the funds of the Young Women's Christian Association of that city: Miss Stanwood, Hampden, $5; Mrs. O. A. Fuller, Montpelier, Me., $5; A. Friend, Nest Berne, $1; J. R. M. Kingsford, $5; Rev. Hall, Bridge Union Bridge, Md., $1; Mrs. M. L. Keene, Fairfax, [illegible] $5; Mrs. I. S. Kuhn, Kansas, $1; Mrs. M. L. [illegible] & Dawson, $10; $5; Mrs. Isabella Reed, Washington, $1; Miss [illegible] Cross, Boston, $5; Mrs. L. E. Hartman, Philadelphia, $1; Miss J. Richmond, Patterson, N. J., 50 cents.

"THE WHITE HOUSE GROUNDS ARE RESPLENDENT WITH BEDS OF TULIPS, HYACINTHS, VIOLETS, AND PANSIES"

Easter Egg-Rolling ON THE White House Lawn

OUR National Capital lies far enough below the Mason and Dixon line to insure, usually, an ideal spring day for Easter, and when it occurs, as it does this year, toward the middle of April, the city is sure to be a dream of beauty. The tree-lined streets, which stretch in every direction from the Potomac to the boundary line of the District, are quivering in the balmy air beneath the bursting buds, in the pale greens of their pristine foliage. The grounds at the White House and Capitol are resplendent with their fragrant beds of tulips, hyacinths, English violets, and pansies, while the many parks and reservations are ideally lovely under the witching touch of returning spring.

Franklin Park, Fourteenth and K streets, is especially attractive now. In its centre is a running fountain, surrounded by a large lily pond, filled with Japanese water foliage, which begins flowering early in the spring, and by Easter morning its broad surface will be covered with gorgeous colored blossoms. Just beyond it a tall dog-wood tree is completely covered with a shower of white blossoms. Tropic and Oriental flora of many varieties are growing within the square block of this sylvan reservation. Thomas Circle, with its luxurious umbrella trees, and rounded beds of smiling pansies; McPherson Square, with its riotous growth of trees and shrubs; and Lafayette Park, opposite the White House, with its spring magnolias in full bloom, are as beautiful as Franklin Square, while those which lie in the remoter parts of the city are equally attractive in their spring dress.

Easter week has become almost as much of a holiday season in Washington as the Christmas-tide. That which, more than anything else, attracts the eye at Easter-tide has been the annual egg-rolling on the undulating lawn of the White House. Colonel Crook, who was President Lincoln's personal aide, and who for almost forty years has been a member of the White House force, was asked recently about the origin of this custom.

"I cannot say positively," he replied, "but you know that the custom was begun on Capitol Hill. In those days the Capital Park was surrounded with a high picket fence, and at a certain hour every night, the iron gates were locked, and no one could pass in or out. The park was always a popular playground with the children of that end of town, who used to play there all the year 'round, and on Easter Mondays they took their eggs there to roll them down the grassy hills. When I came to Washington, nearly forty years ago, they were rolling them on the hillocks of the south grounds of the White House, as they do now. As to its origin, I heard that one Easter Monday morning, President Buchanan was riding past the east gate of the Capitol grounds, when he saw a big crowd of disconsolate children standing there with their baskets of eggs on their arms, and many of them crying. He stopped his carriage, and wanted to know what in the world was the matter. The sobbing urchins told him that the hard-hearted Senators had ordered the gates locked, and left word that the children were not to roll eggs any more in Capitol Park 'because they made such a muss.'

"'Muss, indeed!' Mr. Buchanan ejaculated. 'Well, the White House grounds are not too fine to be covered with egg-shells. Here, as many of you as can, get in and ride with me; the rest can follow along, and you can roll your eggs in my grounds to your heart's content.'

THE CHILDREN'S EASTER FROLIC IN THE PRESIDENT'S GROUNDS

"Whether this story be true or not," said the Colonel, "I cannot pretend to say, but I do know that when I came here, during the Civil War, it was the custom for the little people to have their Easter Monday frolic, although they did not attend it then in such numbers as they do now. The Sunday Schools of the District of all denominations had an alliance then called the Sunday School Union. For a good many years I was president of the Southwest Washington branch of this Union, and we inaugurated an Easter Monday celebration, which was participated in by all the schools of the District. On that day the scholars, teachers, and officers gathered, and with bands playing, flags, banners, mottoes and bunting flying, marched in a body up to the White House, where the President would come out on the south porch and review them. Then speeches were made by prominent public men, afterward the scholars disbanded and would remain to play in the grounds as long as they liked. In this way I really think that the egg-rolling became a fixed spring outing for the children of the capital."

In by-gone years, before the crowd which attended became so great, the President often opened the East Room and received the little people at a short reception. The last Easter that Mr. Cleveland was in the White House was a damp, raw day, and soon after noon a drizzling rain set in. Despite the weather, hundreds of little folks had gathered on the lawn. As the rain commenced to come down, they were utterly disconsolate, but their sorrow fled in a twinkling, when word was passed that the President would receive them in the house. Mothers and nurses, with their broods of water-bedraggled youngsters, hurried to the north door of the mansion and presented themselves in the East Room. Mr. Cleveland had a handshake and a smile for each child.

"You must have a lot of patience in stock to-day, Mr. President," said one lady, toward the end of the hour, as she piloted three little tots up to him.

"Oh, it doesn't require patience to meet children," he replied quickly. "I am always glad to see the little folks," and stopping the lad of the party, a sturdy boy of eight, he added, "How do you do, my son, did you get tired of waiting?"

It's needless to say that the President made a life-long friend of the mother of that boy.

Washington's older inhabitants recall with sadness the Easter of '61. The capital was under siege, and cut off from all communication. No trains could come within miles, and the telegraph wires were down. All who could secure conveyances, sent their families with all speed toward the Pennsylvania State line. Easter was indeed that year a "black Sunday." But the glad bells of peace have rung that memorable Easter far into the past, and its horrors have been forgotten in the happy ones which have passed since then. This year, the services in all the churches will consist of magnificent music and appropriate sermons, and flowers in profusion will decorate altar and chancel. The President will be away on his western trip, but Mrs. Roosevelt will have the children of the family with her at the White House, and will give one of her popular "At homes." The town will be filled with distinguished guests, and there will be entertainments in their honor at many of the embassies and legations. ABBY G. BAKER.

Preaching to the Prisoners

The readers of this journal are familiar with the work of the Gospel Mission to the Tombs. Nearly 1,600 persons, representing almost every State in the Union, and often every quarter of the globe, find themselves in this prison in the course of a year. Gratifying results have been made in preaching and working personally among the prisoners. The annual report of the work is just published, and any one can have a copy by writing to Chaplain Munro, Tombs Prison, New York City. Contributions, may be forwarded to Mr. George E. Sterry, 79 Pine Street, New York City.

Easter at Lonesome Ford

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

MISS CHARLOTTE PERKINS, with a young companion, lived in a large house on a fine avenue, lined with mansions similar to her own, and surrounded by fair gardens, which in April were ablaze with tulips and jonquil. The town was a thriving place in the Middle West, and society there was cultured and refined, with a somewhat exclusive inner circle to which Miss Perkins belonged. She was of aristocratic traditions, and possessed inherited wealth, having, in fact, more money than she could spend, and often finding time heavy on her hands for lack of something interesting to do. Most springs saw the Perkins' home closed, except for a room or two, left in charge of a caretaker, while the owner was abroad in Athens or Nice, or on the Nile, or else enjoying the lavish bloom of California, or loitering in the orange groves of Florida. This year Miss Perkins, in weariness of body and surfeit of travel, had remained at home, and the daughter of an old schoolmate was keeping her company. Lulu Bond had known nothing of luxury until she came to D——, and had been installed in her position as companion and secretary, with a generous salary, in this home of elegant ease. Her father was a home missionary at Lonesome Ford, in a frontier mining community, and his annual stipend was less than the amount paid by Miss Perkins to Lulu for her services. But the girl, homebred and home-taught in the little parsonage, where self-denial went hand in hand with truest love, had never seen such discontent, such fretfulness, and such poverty of resource, as confronted her every day in her employer's house. There were days when Lulu was so homesick for that bit of a cottage, with its penury and privations, and its brave, courageous facing of difficulties, and joyous endeavor, that she wanted to fly back there. Only the thought of what her earnings meant to the dear people at Lonesome Ford kept her steadfast at her post. She was helping along, and that was a comfort.

"Lulu," said Miss Perkins, one morning in early April, "the Flower Committee will be sending somebody round for any contribution to the Easter decoration of the church. Run out to the greenhouse and ask John what he can send. Not that I care much for Easter," she added.

Lulu loved the greenhouse, especially now. As she pushed open the door, and stepped into the warm, moist atmosphere, noticing how the beaded drops stood on pane and roof, how the dear little violets were scenting the air and smiling as if glad to be alive, observing the carnations and jonquils making a riot of color, the azaleas whiter than the drifted and new-fallen snow, and the lilies uplifting their beauty in sheaves, she was for an instant spellbound. She drew a deep breath of delight. The crusty old Scotch gardener, who liked Lulu, gave her a red rose, and told her to report that he would have flowers and to spare for Easter.

"Flowers and to spare," she repeated, wistfully, with a longing look in her blue eyes. "Oh, John! Many to spare?"

"Why surely, miss, a heap of them," he answered. "Miss Perkins can provide all her friends with Easter posies this April."

Lulu went slowly back. She was trying to gather up her resolution to the point of asking Miss Perkins to send some Easter bloom to the little church at Lonesome Ford. Oh, if she but dared to propose it!

Such a rough little church it was, built of logs, and with hard pews that had no backs. A mere shelter from wind and weather; but her father was so thankful to have it, and when it was filled to the door, as sometimes it happened to be, with the miners and their wives and children, Lulu had seen a look on that father's face, that made her understand how Moses must have beamed on the people when his countenance shone after communion with God in the secret fastnesses of the mountains.

"What are you thinking of, my dear?" asked Miss Perkins, an hour later, suddenly growing aware of the far-away look in Lulu's eyes.

The girl pulled herself together. It was part of a companion's duty to be cheerful and not absent-minded.

"I was just then at Lonesome Ford, I'm afraid, Miss Perkins. It's a year since I saw my mother, and her last letter shows me that she is not well. I've been wondering if I ought not to go home."

"Nonsense, child, you can't leave me. I'm not well, either."

"I know, dear Miss Perkins, but you have so many friends, and a good doctor, and the servants all devoted to you, and mother has nobody but father and the children."

The spinster sighed inaudibly. Her thoughts were reminiscent. Helen Sherman and herself had been seat-mates at school. Not one of her class had been more beautiful, more fascinating, more brilliant and clever than Helen Sherman. When she married Frank Bond, and went away as a home missionary to a wilderness exile, to want, and hard work, and a life cut off from the world, most of her acquaintances had soon forgotten her. Charlotte Perkins had kept up a rambling correspondence, writing to and hearing from Helen at long intervals, finally sending for Lulu, when she felt too acutely the isolation of her own home, Helen had not done so badly. Miss Perkins thought, to have raised a daughter like Lulu, to have five other children, sons and daughters, and a husband of Frank's calibre. Why, oh! why, with his talents, had he buried himself there? Why had he never come out of the desert, come where he might have a city parish?

Miss Perkins was a woman given to rapid decisions. She made up her mind quickly, and having ways and means at her command, she never had to hesitate long. A project flashed upon her imagination suddenly.

"Telephone to Madame Rosalind and Mrs. Dunwiddie to come up at once with samples," she said. "You and I must take a little journey; we are both getting blue, and we both need a new outfit, Lulu. I want you to look as charming as twenty ought to, my dear."

Lulu obeyed, but with a sinking heart. The drawing homeward was so strong, so peremptory, and here was a new departure; probably she was to go across the continent again, as she had already done twice or thrice, at the caprice of Miss Perkins. What did she care for more new frocks? Her wardrobe was bulging with raiment now, and her mother had nothing but a shiny alpaca for best, and a gingham for everyday, while her father's coat was white at the seams, and hopelessly shabby. The money she sent was to educate the boys. None of it would be spent for clothes, she was sure.

"Lulu!"

"Yes, Miss Perkins."

"Is your mother as stout as I am?"

Lulu laughed.

"Mother is no larger than I. She is as slender and thin as if she were sixteen."

"Indeed! Well, she is to be congratulated. I do hate being so stout."

Lulu made no reply.

"You may as well pack up everthing of yours that she can make over for the children. Helen was always a genius with her needle, I remember, and send the box right along. And I have a letter for her, that is to be put in the middle of the box; her birthday comes on Easter Sunday this year."

Lulu stared in surprise. Miss Perkins surveyed her gravely. "Child," she said, "you are not the only person in the world who loves your mother, and knows that she is sweet and brave and too good for us all. That she belongs, and your Luther, too, both of them, belong to the band of whom the world is not worthy. By the by, when you go to pack, send old John up to see me."

John, a little rheumatic, gray as a badger, and a gardener from the top of his head to the soles of his feet, came hobbling into his mistress's presence.

"John," she said, "I'm going away. You will see that the Easter flowers are sent to the church in time, and send also as many as you can of the left-overs to the hospitals. But, tell me, can you possibly pack a box of lilies and ferns and roses, and get it to Lonesome Ford, where Miss Lulu's parents live, in good order, the day before Easter. It's two days journey, John."

"The thing can be done, madam."

"Then, you do it. And mind, John, Miss Lulu is not to know one iota about it."

The next week was a perfect whirl of dressmaking, errand-going and dismantling the house. Lulu noticed that Miss Perkins was preparing for a long jaunt. When she asked where they were going, Miss Perkins gave her a very curt reply. So that she felt her curiosity inopportune, and did not venture another allusion to the subject. But she was not a girl to mope, and having decided that it was right to stay with her employer for the time, she maintained her serenity, was bright and sunny, and so lovable that Miss Perkins had hard work to persevere in her reserve, and not disclose the destination to which they would presently be bound.

The truth was that Miss Perkins had resolved to go to Lonesome Ford, take Lulu, and see for herself what Helen's life was.

They started Westward on a Wednesday, stopping off each evening to rest in a hotel. Miss Perkins had a horror of sleeping-cars. Before very long Lulu divined the intention of their trip, and was mentally swinging, like Mahomet's coffin, between heaven and earth. She was wild with rapture at the thought of seeing home again. She was cold with dismay at the impression home would make on Miss Perkins' mind.

They arrived at the last station, and were deposited on a rough platform where there was not a house in sight. An old, ramshackle stage, with a nondescript harness and a pair of mules, would take them the last five miles. As they climbed into this conveyance, Lulu could have hugged the rough, red-faced driver, who squeezed her hand until it ached.

"Oh, Jim Carson!" she cried, "how are father and mother?"

"Your pop's hearty, Lulu, but your marm's looking peaked. Be this lady goin' home with you, Lulu?"

"Yes, Jim. This is Miss Perkins, a friend of my mother's."

"Pleased to meet you, ma'am," said Jim affably, extending a rough paw, and crushing Miss Perkins' hand almost as fiercely as he had Lulu's.

To say that Charlotte Perkins had a novel sensation when she sat at Frank Bond's right that evening, and heard him ask God's blessing on the frugal meal that was served before the family, faintly expresses the case. She had seen poverty in city tenements, afar off. Now she met it close by in a home as exquisitely clean as her own, though bare as an empty plate. Only necessities there. Not a useless cup or saucer.

In the two days before Easter, she had a revelation of the dignity, the beauty, the stern asceticism of the life Frank Bond and his wife had chosen. She saw the bleak holes in the ground under which lay untold wealth of mineral and ore. Lulu took her around to the cabins to make friends with the people. Her heart went out to them. Frank carried her with him in his creaking old buggy to visit his sick parishioners miles away, for his was a widely scattered flock.

Not a complaint, not a whispered murmur did she hear, but when the box came, a day after the travelers, and Helen found a roll of crisp ten dollar bills as her birthday present, she put her arms around Charlotte's neck and cried.

"My dear," she said, "I haven't seen so much money at one time since I was a girl. But why did you send it by freight?"

"When I sent it, Helen, I was not quite certain that after all, I would dare to come. But the yearning in Lulu's eyes pleaded with me, and it was borne upon me that I was getting to be a selfish old maid, and I hurried seeing you would give me a lift into a better life, and it has. Yes, it has."

John's box of flowers came in season, and very early in the dawn of Easter Day, Miss Perkins and Lulu

LOVE, LAW, LIBERTY ❋ Quarterly Temperance Lesson

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR APRIL 19
ROMANS 13: 7-14

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT: "LOVE WORKETH NO ILL TO HIS NEIGHBOR: THEREFORE LOVE IS THE FULFILLING OF THE LAW." ROMANS 13: 10

THE Epistle to the Romans was written by the Apostle Paul in Corinth, A. D., 57, just before starting for Jerusalem. It was sent by Phoebe, a deaconess. Let us recall what great men have said about this epistle: Luther calls it, "The chief part of the New Testament and the purest Gospel." (The Reformation of the sixteenth century was inspired by the Epistles to the Romans and Galatians). Coleridge speaks of Romans as "The most profound work in existence." Meyer thinks it "The grandest, boldest and most complete composition of Paul."

Some one has copied the Emancipation Proclamation, so as to produce by the shading of the letters, an excellent likeness of its author, Abraham Lincoln. The portrait seems to lie below the words, as if they were being uttered by his lips. So, in our lesson, we see under the words: "Render to all their dues, tribute to whom tribute is due," a portrait of Christ on that day, when he was asked by his enemies: "Is it lawful to give tribute to Cæsar?" and he replied: "Show me the tribute money." They brought him a penny, and he asked: "Whose is this image and superscription?" They answered: "Cæsar's." Jesus replied: "Render therefore unto Cæsar, the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God, the things that are God's." And those who had asked the question to entangle him, became their own victims. Paul was wise and tactful, to put in this form the truth he would teach to the Roman Christians that they should do their duties both to God and government. As they rendered back to Cæsar the coin stamped with his image, they were also to render back to God themselves, being created in his image. Man, created in God's likeness, should be like God in his feelings and in his relations to his fellow-men.

Again we see a portrait of Christ in the writing of Paul, under the words, "Love is the fulfilling of the law." In Christ's presence there stands the rich young ruler, asking, "Good Master, what good thing shall I do that I may have eternal life?" Jesus repeats the Commandments: "Thou shalt do no murder, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Honor thy father and thy mother, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." The young man claims always to have kept these commandments from a child, and asks, "What lack I yet?" Jesus sees a root of disobedience in the young man's heart, which he himself has not discovered, and reveals it to him by asking him to devote his wealth to the poor. This the young man is unwilling to do, and turns sorrowfully away. He lacks supreme love to God and man, and so has broken the whole law of right relations by his selfishness. Paul writes: "Love worketh no ill to his neighbor; therefore love is the fulfilling of the law." And yet again Paul reminds them to bear the image of their unselfish, spiritual Master when he says, "Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ." The image in which they had been created they were in danger of marring by drunkenness, and other bad habits to which liquors lead. No one thing so often mars the image of God in man, nothing so often puts hate and selfishness in place of love to our neighbor as the curse of drink. We have sometimes seen a coin whose superscription had been so worn off, as to become illegible. Such coins have diminished value. Paul appeals to those Christians who may have lost the brightness of the Christ image, to have it restored. He calls on them to "awake out of sleep," and "cast off the works of darkness," and "put on the armor of light." Let us place two coins side by side, one fresh from the mint, with even the smallest hair-line of the superscription standing out in relief; the other battered and misshapen, the image nearly destroyed; and let us decide that we will be the "clear-cut" Christians, rendering to God the things that are God's and to Government, no less, the duties we owe to Government; getting into right relations with God and man by loving both, and on such love building our laws, personal and social, and crowning all with true liberty, which can be built only on love and law.

In the spring of the year 372, a young man, in the thirty-first year of his age, in evident distress of mind, entered his garden near Milan. The sins of his youth

LIBERTY — THE RUMSELLER'S IDOL

With apologies to Bartholdi, the designer of the famous statue at the entrance of New York Harbor

— a youth spent in sensuality and impiety — weighed heavily on his soul. Lying under a fig-tree, moaning and pouring out abundant tears, he heard from a neighboring house a young voice saying, and repeating in rapid succession, "Take and read! Take and read!" Receiving this as a Divine admonition, he procured the roll of Paul's epistles. Describing the scene, he says: "I opened it, and read in silence the chapter on which my eyes first lighted (it was the thirteenth of Romans). 'Let us walk honestly, as in the day; not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying. But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof.'" He obeyed at once the divine command. His mother's prayers were answered. The grand career of Augustine, the holiest of the Fathers, then commenced.

Illustration and Application

The young and old of this self-indulgent age, which combines an increasing demand for "personal liberty" with a diminishing sense of personal responsibility, need to be reminded over and over again that there is no true liberty apart from law, and no true law that God has not made out of love. Anarchy is as much the opposite of liberty as is tyranny. Indeed the tyranny of the mob is worse than the tyranny of the monarch. Liberty is not an engine jumping the track, but an engine moving forward on the fixed rails of law, with liberty only to go the right way and lead others in it. In God's world of wise laws there can be no personal liberty to do wrong with impunity. The liberty of the person must be subordinate to the liberty of the populace. If it were true that a strong man might use a saloon without manifest harm to himself, yet if, on the whole, the saloon will be a harmful resort to the young and the weak; if it will disturb right relations among men by quarrels and crimes and impoverishment, the liberty of the community to promote its best good must overrule the selfish personal liberty that demands a dangerous indulgence.

"Liberty under law" has been the great Anglo-Saxon watchword, under which greater and more secure progress has been wrought than under the frantic French cry of "personal liberty." But "Young America" especially, should be taught that law is not a stern taskmaster, but only another name for "Love divine, all love excelling." Man cannot make or break law, though it may break him. Man can only translate God's law, born of his love, into its human applications, even as a lawyer does not make but only interprets and applies law. Legislators are "ministers of God," "ordained" to serve him and humanity by applying the great constitutional law of God to civil affairs. A "license" to do wrong is not a law but a legislative crime. On the other hand, every prohibition of what works ill to our neighbor, is a translation of love for man into a statute, its purpose being, as Gladstone has said, to make it "harder to do wrong and easier to do right." Since wrong-doing is the road to unhappiness here and hereafter, for the individual and for society, surely love can do no better service than to prohibit and prevent such wrong-doing. The solid, divine, foundation of all laws prohibiting liquor selling, and of all other prohibitory laws that forbid what is harmful, is, in our golden text, the best of "no license" texts: "Love worketh no ill to his neighbor: therefore, love is the fulfilling of the law." Again, we suggest the use of that text as a saloon sign. If the saloon cannot bear such a motto, it is a crime, and not only those who own it, but those who keep it up by their patronage, or their petition, or their ballot, are working ill to their neighbor, and so breaking the law of brotherhood, which is the law of God.

Even among Christians there are many who think it is not always "expedient" to do right. If God made and rules this world, can it ever be "expedient" for man to do wrong? Was Lincoln wrong when he said it was vain to seek a midway between right and wrong? "Right wrongs no man." Is not the man who denies that Christian axiom in word or deed an infidel? God forbids us to "call evil good and good evil," and to "justify the wicked for a reward." Do we not do both when we as a community permit a saloon to run in consideration of a fee paid into our common treasury? All will agree it is right to vote for any degree of prohibition we can get, but is it ever allowable to vote for any license of what is harmful? If it is not right for an individual to sell alcoholic beverages, can it be right for a whole town or State to become rumsellers on the dispensary or Norwegian plan? This is now likely to succeed high license as the "Diana of the hour" among those who want to find something easier than righteousness in dealing with the liquor traffic.

"RENDER UNTO CÆSAR THE THINGS THAT ARE CÆSAR'S, AND UNTO GOD THE THINGS THAT ARE GOD'S"

AGAINST SWEARING

Results of One Year's Activity by the Anti-Profanity League....

IT is just one year since there appeared in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD an article introducing the Anti-Profanity League to the great circle of its readers. That challenge for a campaign against our "national sin," swearing, was not ignored. Twelve hundred CHRISTIAN HERALD readers responded and became members of the League; five hundred gave themselves to active assistance in the distribution of literature; forty-five organized local Leagues of their own, and four became secretaries of their respective States. As a result of this lively interest, what was before a local movement has become a religious force of recognized national importance. As the result of one year's efforts, the League reports:

1. We have gained a pledged and registered membership of 1,000, coming from forty States, two territories, Canada, Nova Scotia, Scotland, England, Ireland and Switzerland, making our organization international in its scope.

2. We have formed sixty efficient working organizations in various States.

3. We have appointed State secretaries in five States, who are waging the campaign in their respective States.

4. We have secured the preaching of at least one hundred sermons against profanity, some of them by leaders of the national pulpit, most notable among them being "The American Pulpit" sermon by Rev. Frank DeWitt Talmage in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of October 15, on the theme, "Pestilent Profanity." This was printed in the newspapers in the United States and England, and had millions of readers. We likewise have the promise of similar sermons by Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman and others.

The League has waged so effective a campaign as to attract the attention of the secular press and excite favorable editorial comment in many States. It has published three sermons, and forty cards, tracts and circulars against cursing and swearing. It has waged an extensive propaganda, distributing and circulating 150,000 pieces of literature. Its secretary has addressed twenty-one audiences and four ministers' meetings upon the work. It has secured the insertion of a topic bearing on the "Evils of Profanity" in the Y. P. S. C. E. Junior and Local Union topic-list for 1903, and laid a similar request before the union committee on topics for all young people's societies. It has drawn the attention of the Christian church to what was hitherto a practically neglected field. It has induced Y. P. S. C. E., Epworth Leagues, Young People's Unions and Sunday Schools to appoint Anti-Profanity committees, and in other ways take up the work. It has enlisted the sympathies of that class of men who do things, as witness—a town ordinance against profanity in Nebraska; swearing prohibited in factories, and among employees. It has scores of letters testifying to specific cases where our work has brought profane men to their senses, and in some cases to Jesus Christ.

It asks the hearty and generous co-operation of "friends old and new," and solicits from the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a share of their prayers, their thoughts and personal influence during 1903.

The apostles rejoiced that they were counted worthy to suffer reproach for the name. Are you not willing to make a little effort to preserve its honor?

To all who will write me, I will gladly forward full particulars of our movement.

REV. ROLAND D. SAWYER.

Loose Preaching Rebuked

In a sermon preached in Syracuse, N. Y., recently, Bishop Huntington, of the Episcopal Church, sharply criticized a class of ministers who figure out "an easy time for the sinner after death." Not one in a hundred had the courage to preach the truth concerning judgment and retribution:

A man of the world who has never claimed to be a believer and is a pew-owner, who does not pretend to apply the precepts or principles of his Gospel to his business or club life, drinks freely, swears profanely when he is provoked, if he goes occasionally to church, likes sermons that insist upon God's love for everybody alike, discredits rigid religious standards, disparages creeds and advocates open Sundays, why should he like such sermons? A man that has been cheating, lying and lecherring all the week, goes to church and is told that hell is a bugbear, and that ministers who preach it are bigots. He will go home to his dinner with satisfaction and cheerfully pay his pew tax and crush widows' homes and cheat and lecher another week. That God loves and will not punish all he sees in Wall Street and Vanity Fair, in fashionable society, in shops, in nurseries, in seminaries, in slave pens, in saloons, in kitchens, and in chambers, I will not believe

A GRINDSTONE FOR A PULPIT

IT is Saturday morning. The sun is just beginning to shine and yield. The thermometer registers 20 below zero. The prairie is thirty inches deep in the snowdrifts. It is impossible to keep the appointment. He knows the road will be in terrible condition, calling it nothing. He takes his gun, a few shells, lighter, pencils, in his hand, and starts some time up the road. Some [illegible] come along with the hand car and gave him a ride of a few miles. Then a long tramp of four hours, followed by a ride of eleven miles in the power of appointments. A social gathering with the parishioners and helping the evening, and late at night he is at liberty to retire.

The Lord's Day dawns. The thermometer has gone down still lower. It is 32 degrees below zero. A few hundred people in gathered, and after a ride of two and a half miles a service is held. Twenty-two are present. Two couples have not been able to attend a service for three years. The pastor speaks of the cheer and comfort of God's presence (Acts 23:11). The aged father and mother are elated to see and are very grateful. As soon as the service ends the team is hitched up and away we go to town. The pastor now takes his own team and the brethren with us with him in the morning, and they go to the logging camp five miles on the other side of town. We go to the "bunk house" where the men are. Some are reading, some writing, some darning socks. The bunks are ranged around three sides of the room, in two tiers. In the centre of the room stands the big box stove. Around the stove, on wires stretched across the room, hangs the week's washing. About forty men are present. Hymn books are distributed. A hymn is sung and the pastor leads in prayer. All are quiet. The pulpit is a large grindstone. The text is from Luke 15:17. The pastor tries to show how the world is blessed in Christ. A more respectful hearing could not be asked for.

After the service we repair to the "grub shanty," and are regaled with a hearty dinner, three-thirty, and the pastor has held two services and driven ten miles in the cold since breakfast. Lunch is served in tin dishes, tin plates, tin cups. The butter is in a tin cup, the sugar in a tin can. Not a dish of sweetmeats on the table. Hunger is a good sauce, and the sincere welcome makes one forget the plainness of the surroundings. After lunch we begin to pray, and at half-past seven meet for worship in the schoolhouse. Thirty are present. The pastor gives a Bible reading, getting his subject, "Gospel Conversation." Luke 24:13-32.

The day is gone. Three services, and fifteen miles driven in the cold. What has been accomplished? God knows. The pastor is only responsible for the faithful presentation of the Gospel. The results rest with God. Rev. G. W. [illegible]

A Western Mission

In the western part of Oklahoma Territory is a mission field of fifteen by twenty miles in extent, with a population of about 5,000, many of whom are poor and are in need houses and "dugouts." My husband preaches to them Sundays in the little sod or frame schoolhouses and during the week we visit them, talk with them about Christ, and leave religious books and papers for them to read. If any readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD wishes to send me good literature for distribution, I will see that it is put where it will do the greatest good.

"The Apostle of the Filipinos"

Evangelist Nicolas Zamora writes to "The Christian Herald" of his Gospel Campaign

THAT the spread of the Gospel is progressing in the Philippines is shown by the encouraging letters received from the Christian workers in those islands. Rev. Nicolas Zamora, "the Apostle of the Filipinos," whose recent work has been materially extended by the aid rendered by readers of this journal, sends this interesting letter:

EVANGELIST BAUTISTA

"On the 12th of October, 1902, I went to the province of Pampanga, to preach in the towns of that province called San Fernando and Mexico. The day I was there, the number of men and women who took part in the services at San Fernando was five hundred, and in Mexico, two hundred. We have now two good chapels in those towns. During the months of October, November, and December, 1902, I continued holding services in Manila and Malibon. On the 27th of November, Thanksgiving was celebrated by a great meeting in a large hall in the Santa Cruz district of Manila. The 'Obispo Maximo' of the Yglesia Filipina Independente (the Philippine Independent Church), Rev. Gregorio Aglipay, and one of the members of the committee of that church, Dr. Isabello de los Reyes, aided in the service. The number of people, men and women, present passed the 1,200 mark.

"On the day of the Nativity a dedication service was held for the new Methodist Episcopal Chapel at Santa Mesa, with attendance of more than five hundred men and women. On Christmas night, as well as at the watch-night service at the close of the year, more than twelve hundred persons were present to participate in the meetings held in the Pentecost Tabernacle.

"On Jan. 3d I made another itinerary in Pampanga province; eight hundred people at San Fernando, three hundred in Mexico, and one hundred at Sta. Tomas (a small barrio), took part in the meetings. There is now residing in San Fernando an evangelist who is doing faithful work, Telesforo Pineda.

"I am kept continually busy with my work, having had no vacation from preaching since the month of August, 1899, and now have about one thousand who are regular attendants at my services, the weekly congregations being, in Malabon, at Tulong Duhat, 300, at Tangos, 300, at Tonsuya, 100, and in Santa Cruz, Manila, 300.

"Very sincerely, your servant in Christ, NICOLAS ZAMORA"

In a later letter, dated Feb. 7, Pastor Zamora writes:

EVANGELIST CASTRO

Your letter, with draft, received. Our work here is thoroughly organized under the direction of the Evangelical Union, composed of the membership of all the Evangelical Missions represented in the islands. This organization is a great help in avoiding all effects and even the appearances of denominationalism. We are a united body for Christ. We cannot take care of more than a small part of those who are clamoring for the Gospel, and who, through the arrangements of the Union, have been placed under our particular charge. We need many more workers indeed. Our Mission carried on a training school last year, and we have several young men who, so far, have been supporting themselves entirely and doing much work, preaching and teaching. We believe several of these will make good pastors.

I conferred with the finance committee of our mission (composed of Dr. Homer C. Stuntz, Rev. J. L. McLaughlin and myself), and we chose two young men who have had training and shown ability. These we recommend to your CHRISTIAN HERALD readers' support. One, brother Jose Bautista, goes into a new place to open services for the first time, the other, brother Servilliano Castro, goes to Mololos (about twenty-five miles from Manila), where considerable work has already been done. He seems to be gifted as a trainer and director of those who have started in the Way, but who do not know what to do. So we thought that would be the best place for them to go. The whole amount contributed by your readers will be deposited with the treasurer of our Mission, and held as a special fund for the purpose for which it is sent, and an account will be rendered to you from time to time, as to the expenditure of the money, and the work accomplished by the men whom it supports.

HOME CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL PHILADELPHIA

The 20th Century Wife and Mother

THE MOTHER IN THE FIELD

By MARY VIRGINIA TERHUNE

FROM the beginning, the small girl, even more, perhaps, than the small boy, should be taught to respect the body. To respect it by giving it proper nourishment, and withholding from it the things that will work it harm; to respect it by bringing it to its best possibilities through athletic training; to respect it by keeping it outwardly and inwardly clean.

The fashion that has, of late, dictated outdoor sports as part of the curriculum of the English and American jeune fille bien elevee, is wise enough to atone for many of the follies that have been perpetrated in the name of La Mode. After all, it is but a reversion of the young lady to the tastes she probably had as a child. If little girls do not climb trees—and tumble out of them—go wading, and fishing, and bird-nesting, and hunt "yellow-jackets" in summer; skate, and slide, and sled in winter; and play ball, spin tops, and shoot marbles in their season, it is because they lack the chance. Turn them loose in the country and they would do all the outdoor things their brothers do, and with as much zest and enthusiasm. They, too, love to drive the cows to and from pasture (especially if this is not their regular work), to ride the horses to water, to climb on the loaded hay-wagons, and take a hand at cleaning and harnessing the horses, or in feeding the pigs. Blessed be the new convention that permits them to don overalls or "knickers" in their summer vacations! When circumstances deny small girls these joys, substitutes must be sought in gymnasium work, and in such outdoor sports as lie within reach of the city child. These are indispensable, if the future home maker is to be sound of body as well as of mind.

If more stress seems to be laid upon other things than upon study, it is because the topics handled are not cares that may be deputed to others. Teachers may train the brain, but no one except the mother can adequately look after the development of the heart and of the body. Yet, while the book education may sometimes be safely entrusted to teachers, the girl who is accustomed to the surroundings of a cultured home, will show the effects of this throughout her school life. She may not have known that she was taking in knowledge at the pores, so to speak, but the result will manifest itself in her routine work. Even without being the girl's instructor in specific branches, the mother is incessantly teaching. The accurate speech, the corrections of fault in word and phrase, the taking for granted of certain knowledge, the clearing up of hazy information, the rectification of false impressions—all have their part in educating the girl. When it comes to the wise choice of books for the girl to read; to the equally wise refusal; to the encouragement and general supervision of correspondence; to the cultured fellowship the mother may give the daughter; the benefit the latter may reap from the constant association, make the mere recitation and hearing of lessons even an almost inconsiderable factor in the general education.

Yet, in this, too, the mother must bear her part. The rules and regulations of the majority of our schools appear severe enough to oblige a child to learn, willy-nilly, but the youthful mind has a marvelous facility for the parrot-like acquisition of learning that profiteth nothing. Witness the case of Emmy Lou, in her struggle with music and with spelling. A, in the musical scale is "do," had taught the music-master.

"Do!" said Mr. Cato, "do—always do—not A, nor B, nor C, never A, nor B, nor C again—do! do!" the bow rapping angrily the while. "Forget now it was ever A. A is do here!"

Emmy Lou resolved she never would forget. A is dough. How or why or wherefore it did not matter. The point was, A is dough. Then came spelling. This time the rest might forget, but Emmy Lou would not. It came her turn.

She stood up. Her word was Adam. And A was dough. Emmy Lou went slowly to get it right. "Dough-d-dough-m, Adam!" said Emmy Lou.

One hardly needs to read the early part of the tale to know that the child was motherless. For the right sort of a mother would have known enough of the child's lessons to have given her help at home and aided her over the stumbling blocks of misunderstanding and through the slough of ignorance.

As the girl grows older and comes to her college days, it is asking a good deal of the ordinary mother to keep abreast of the daughter in her studies. Dearly as the older woman would love to do this—for there is a keen hunt in falling away from the child with whom she has hitherto walked side by side—the mother cannot, in justice to herself and to her other duties, go to school again. But the ready sympathy, and the encouragement may still be forthcoming, and if she can give to the girl what so many women lack—a sense of proportion that enables her to discern the relative values of her occupations or her pursuits, the mother has furnished the daughter with a potent aid in the work of home-making.

There are other things, too, which one hardly hesitates to declare of more importance than book learning. First among them, are courtesy and good breeding. Even now, one occasionally finds them in young girls, but seldom enough to raise them possessed to a possibly disproportionately high place in one's esteem. The rising generation is so sure of itself, so convinced of its own importance, that it has little time and less inclination for thought of the individualities of others. The positive qualities are so much dwelt upon that the negative have almost disappeared from view. One is homesick for them sometimes, or for their possessors. If it were but possible, once in a while, to be refreshed by meeting the girl whom the young women of to-day pillory in one scornful phrase!

"She is not beautiful," they scoff, "and she is not brilliant, but she is a good girl and a great comfort to her mother."

After all, she is not quite so extinct as the dodo. I know one. She is not pretty and she is not clever. But she is a good girl,—good all through, gentle, unassuming, unselfish, always thoughtful for others rather than for herself, saying the friendly word, rendering the friendly service.

She doeth little kindnesses
That most leave undone or despise,
For nought that sets one heart at ease
Or giveth happiness or peace
Is low esteemed in her eyes.

It goes without saying that she is a comfort to her mother and to all about her. And what a home she will some day make!

Like the training in obedience, the girl's course in courtesy must begin at a tender age. The twig is so easily bent then that it scarcely resists the guiding hand. Even with this training, the girl may, when half-grown, come to a stage when self-assertion shows itself and when she feels that it is quite the thing for her to force herself upon people's attention. All growing things have their trying age. But this, too, will pass away, and if the girl has been started right, there is not much difficulty in inducing her to believe that she and all her affairs are not of paramount importance to the public at large; that gentleness and consideration command more love and popularity than self-assertion and carelessness of the concerns and whims of others.

So many qualities besides the severely practical go to the composition of the home-maker as she should be, that what might be called the mechanical part of the training almost slips out of sight. Sometimes it is allowed to remain there, and then the home-maker fails of success. Abstract traits are beautiful and indispensable, but

Will the love that you are rich in
Build a fire in the kitchen
Or the little god of love turn the spit, spit, spit?

In other words, will a well-trained physique, a thoroughly educated mind, a perfectly balanced moral nature, and a due share of what the Italians call gentilezza, make up for ignorance of domestic economy, including in this a knowledge of cookery, of the purchase and care of food, the management of servants and the like? Nay, verily. Do the one, but leave not the other undone.

"The Evening Anthem"

It was in the quiet of a winter evening that I spread the excellent "Art Gallery" out before me for inspection, and to learn which of the ten rare beauties would gain my favor. To add anything to the following soliloquy would be a superfluity.

No carnal thoughts ever wrote upon that face;
Those eyes are windows in a residence of peace.
Wherein a glowing fire of love prevails
As sunshine in the quiet summer vales.
And as I gaze, there cometh like a balm,
O'er my world weary life a strange, sweet calm.
Out from the dust and smoke of earthly strife
She looks, and sees the better light of life.
The woodlands grow serene in afterglow,
I hear "The Evening Anthem" sweet and low.

Ivers & Pond PIANOS.

A faultless mechanical construction, remarkable durability, exterior which, viewed merely as furniture, are real masterpieces of design, but after all it is the tone which distinguishes the Ivers & Pond from hundreds of other pianos, good, bad and indifferent. It is the tone; that surpassingly beautiful, liquid quality; that depth of warm coloring; that sustained vibration; that nice relation of each note to the other—all these it is which make of the Ivers & Pond Piano something different—better. The result is easily appreciated. But the half century of patient effort; the endless experiments; the final success—it is a long story. And the recognition—how over three hundred leading American Educational Institutions have come to purchase and recommend Ivers & Pond Pianos—well, that's another story. More in our catalogue. Shall we send it?

HOW TO BUY.

Wherever in the United States no dealer sells them, we send Ivers & Pond Pianos on trial—at our risk. If After Five Years purchase, if returned at our expense for any way freights both ways. QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

M. A. R., Benkelman, Neb. 1. Ought there to be so many churches as there are? Are they all sanctioned by Scripture? 2. Can they and will they all be drawn into one?

1. Every church believes that it has Scriptural authority for its being. The fact that Christ made no definite church organization, inevitably led to the formation of different churches, each of which emphasized some special aspect of the truth. 2. The first step in that direction is now being made by the Federation Society, which is persuading them to co-operate in Christian work. Perhaps, that is the best that can be hoped for in this generation.

C. L. K., West Leesport. What color is a jasper stone?

A jasper, though generally green, may be of various colors, including purple and cerulean. Its green is not as brilliant as that of the emerald. It was one of the twelve stones in the high priest's breastplate.

Christian. 1. Are there any passages in the Bible forbidding the marriage of first cousins? 2. What States, if any, have laws prohibiting their marriage?

1. See Leviticus, 18th chapter. The rules therein laid down are applied to other relationships, equally close, though not specified, first cousins being usually included. 2. Marriage between first cousins is prohibited in Alaska, Arizona, Arkansas, Illinois, Indiana, Indian Territory, Kansas, Missouri, Nevada, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Washington and Wyoming.

Reader, Spey, N. Y. 1. What is the meaning of Acts 17:31? Does it mean that the righteousness of Christ is the standard to which we are expected to attain, and that those who have not attained to it will be condemned? 2. Is it possible for any one to live a life as pure and holy as Christ's?

1. It means, as we understand it, that people will be judged righteously. Paul was speaking to men who had some experience of courts where men were not judged in righteousness, but suffered through the prejudices and corrupt morals of the judges. 2. Christ is our pattern. He has promised the help of the Holy Spirit to those who seek it. We ought, then, to strive earnestly, depending on him, to live holy lives, and see for ourselves whether it is possible. Why worry over the question if it is possible? Make the attempt and do not lose heart. With God all things are possible.

C. S. J., Rockford, Ill. How did the expression, "When in Rome do as the Romans do," originate?

Rome long ago, it is said, kept Sunday as fast-day, Milan as festival. St. Augustine, in perplexity over his own course when in these cities, went, at the suggestion of his mother, Monica, to St. Ambrose for advice. St. Ambrose said, "When at Milan, be as the Milanese, when in Rome, do as the Romans do."

Mrs. E. C. L., White River Junction, Vt. What was the name of the first church? The Romans claim their church as the first.

The first organized Christian church, known as such, was that at Antioch, Syria, which became a central point for the diffusion of Christianity. There was no Roman church until long afterward.

Regular Subscriber, Plum Run, Pa. A friend who is opposed to Foreign Missions, tells me that of every dollar given to the cause not more than one cent reaches the field: that is, that ninety-nine cents of every dollar given are consumed in administrative expenses. Can that be true?

No, it is wickedly untrue. We have examined the balance-sheets of the chief missionary societies in this country and find that the average cost of administration is from five to seven per cent. That is, that of every dollar received, about ninety-four cents is used in the support of missionaries in the field, the distribution of Christian literature in heathen lands and the general costs of the missions. We believe that of the other six cents a portion is spent in presenting the claims of the mission to the American public, and should therefore be regarded as a productive expense.

E. R., Paris, Texas. Give, with symbolic meaning, birthstone and flower for each month, please.

There are two series of precious stone symbols for the months, the Hebraic and the Polish. We give first the Hebraic, with traditional meanings of stones, and then the numbers of the Polish series, which differ from it. January, garnet (power grace and victory); February, amethyst (health, longevity, wealth); March, jasper (courage, wisdom); April, sapphire (constancy, truth, virtue); May, chalcedony (disperses melancholy), carnelian (prevents misfortune), agate (health, longevity, wealth); June, emerald (immortality, incorruptible, conquest of sin and trial); July, onyx (conjugal felicity); August, carnelian; September, chrysolite (gladness of heart); October, beryl (happiness, everlasting youth); November, topaz (friendship, happiness), December, ruby (charity, dignity, divine power). Polish: March, bloodstone (courage, wisdom); April, diamond (purity, peace, innocence); May, emerald; June, chalcedony or agate; July, ruby; August and September, sardonyx (conjugal happiness); October, aquamarine or beryl; December, turquoise (prosperity, soul-cheerer. Tiffany uses the opal (hope, innocence, purity) and the sapphire for October. The flower symbols are: January, snowdrop (friendship in trouble, consolation, hope); February, primrose (youth and sadness; believe me; the red primrose, inconstancy; the evening primrose, neglected worth); March, violet (love, faithfulness, if blue; modesty, candor, if white); April, daisy (innocence); May, hawthorne (hope); June, honeysuckle (fidelity, bonds of love); July, waterlily (purity of heart); August, poppy (consolation); September, morning glory (affectation); October, hops (injustice); November, chrysanthemum (love, cheerfulness); December, holly (domestic happiness).

M. E. P. ——. Are we to regard the speeches of Job's friends as inspired truth? I have often seen expressions from them quoted as Scripture. Did God inspire them to speak as they did?

Your question is answered authoritatively in the book itself. (See Job 42: 7), where God is represented as saying, "My wrath is kindled against thee and thy two friends; for ye have not spoken of me the thing that is right." You will get a clearer idea of the book, if you regard it as a symposium on the problem of suffering, each speaker being a representative of a school of thought. You will notice that each speaker keeps to the same aspect of the subject, but they all agree in regarding unusual suffering as an evidence of unusual sin. They imply that in Job's case, he being outwardly so good a man, his sin was aggravated by hypocrisy. This was cruelly unjust, because, as we learn by the first chapter, it was precisely because he was so good a man that his affliction came upon him. The author of the book evidently wished to administer a warning to the people of his time against being uncharitable in their inferences.

Jos. G., Anson, Tex. Why are heart failures more common among men than among women?

It is doubtless due to the fact that the abnormal strain and excitement of business life, make men easier victims of such attacks. Woman's life, as a rule, is more placid and normal.

Marian, Roanoke, Va. 1. When were X Rays discovered?

1. The public announcement of the discovery of the X Ray was made in January, 1896, by Dr. William Konrad Roentgen, at the semi-centennial celebration of the founding of the Berlin Physical Society; in following up the researches of Hertz, Lenard and other predecessors on the problem of the cathode rays from a vacuum tube, accident revealed to him the rays, later called "Roentgen" or X-Ray. In 1891, Professor Hertz had demonstrated that a cathode ray would penetrate thin metal; and, in 1894, Dr. Lenard showed that it would not only penetrate thin films of aluminium, wood and other substances, but produce photographic results beyond.

Mrs. W. L. S., Petaluma, Cal. A minister threatens to knock another man down for broaching a disagreeable subject, and when accused of it, replies: "Yes, I did; and it would have been a good thing if I had, only I didn't want to get into a fight with him." Do you think a man of such spirit is fitted to preach the Gospel of Jesus Christ?

He went to extremes. He should have confined himself to an emphatic rebuke, but under no circumstances was he justified in threatening personal violence. All the teachings of Christianity oppose it.

M. A. L. Could you tell me through your columns why prize-fighting brought the elbow into the seal of the State of Massachusetts? 2. Also, what made the little jug in the Connecticut seal?

1. Prize-fighting had nothing to do with any device in the Massachusetts seal. The meaning of the arm, bent at the elbow, the hand grasping a sword, is shown in the State motto, also on the seal: Ense petit placidam sub libertate quietam (With the sword she seeks calm peace under liberty). 2. There is no little jug on the Connecticut seal. There are grape-vines on it, and these symbolize the colony brought over and planted here in the wilderness; the motto interprets the thought Qui transtulit sustinet (Who transplanted sustains).

D. F., Scranton, Ia. Why are we taught, in the Lord's Prayer, "Lead us not into temptation," when in James 1: 13 we find a clause, "neither tempteth he any man?"

more accurate translation, favored by e scholars, reads, "Suffer us not to be led temptation." A still better rendering is of Dean Alford, which reads, "Abandon ot in temptation." It is a prayer for pro- ion against the dangers of temptation.

A. H., Orono, Me. What is the origin and lit- ral meaning of the word Paradise, and in what sense did our Lord use it in addressing the thief on the cross (Luke 23: 43)?

he word, according to Dr. Salmond (see bner's Dictionary of the Bible), is of sian origin, and was transferred to the brew, and afterwards to the Greek. It ans a tract of land, enclosed in walls and of beautiful fruit-bearing trees. A royal asure ground attached to the palace. The d soon became spiritualized in Hebrew ught. It was used for the Garden of n, and also for the heavenly abode of the teous dead. We do not know the exact se in which Christ used it in speaking to thief. The fact, however, that he said, th me in Paradise," would be sufficient to e the repentant man a sense of peace and ty, but whether of being actually in heaven ncertain.

Bridesmaid, Danbury, Conn. 1. Who wrote, "Hope is the bridal cake's best plum?" 2. Who wrote "Love makes marriage merry age?"

We do not know. Jerrold wrote, "In all wedding cake, hope is the sweetest of the ins." The quotation you give may be a ruption of that. 2. "Anonymous" is ap- ded to this expression by books of quo- ion.

Constant Reader, Elwood, Ind. If a husband be- comes dissatisfied with his wife and obtains a divorce, not on Scriptural grounds, is the wife justified in accepting an offer of marriage from another man?

here are differences of opinion on subject. Many believe she is justified marrying again. It appears to be a case allel to that mentioned in I. Cor. 7: 15. d it does not appear that the thirty-ninth se of the same chapter forbids the union. ay be urged that there is only one justifi- on for divorce and therefore in this case, divorce, though granted by the court, is valid in God's sight. Even this objection probably be removed by the husband's on. In the majority of such cases, the son obtaining the divorce soon contracts ew marriage. It is right, however, to say t the above opinion is not that of all Christ- persons. Some hold that marriage is in- oluble by any cause but death. As the rriage service has it, "Till death do us t." Many have no sympathy with that view, it is only fair to recognize the fact that it eld by some learned theologians.

Will "A friend, Carrington," and "Reader," o sent gifts of jewelry to be sold for Fin- d, please send their names and addresses his office?

tressed, Chicago, Ill. A preacher I have heard lately, insists with great emphasis, that unless our sins are confessed publicly before men, they will not be forgiven by God. Is that true? I have sincerely repented of some things I have done, and have made restitution as far as it was in my power, but I would rather die than pub- licly tell the story. Is it necessary?

ay no heed to any such teaching. It is necessary that you confess the details of ur sins to the world. It is not fit to hear the ry; it could not judge rightly; it could not nt forgiveness. In confessing to God and king restitution, you have done your whole y, and if you resolutely abandon your sin l sincerely ask God to forgive you and help to avoid its repetition, you may be sure he will blot the sins out of his book. "The od of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth from sin."

ader, Lexington, Ky. Who invented the plough? According to Chinese history and tradition, Emperor Chin-nung did; and from that ment, they say, Chinese civilization made id progress. According to Egyptian his- y, it was invented in that country. In some de form or other, an implement filling the ce of the plough has doubtless been in use m time immemorial, no one nation more n another being entitled to the distinction ts creation.

F. E., Delta, O. Ought the teacher of a Bible class, composed of young ladies, to speak to them of moral dangers which may assail them, when there is a possibility of their being shocked by the revelation of sins and practices that they do not now suspect?

t would be better that such warnings should ne to them from their mothers. If there reason to believe that the mothers are rlecting that duty, and they are of an age en such knowledge ought to be imparted, it should be given. It is better that the knowledge should reach them in a delicate and sensible form, than in the coarse and vile way in which it may otherwise come to their ears. It should be given in a way that will not excite their curiosity, and great care should be taken to impress them with the beauty of purity in thought, word, and deed. This may be done without entering into de- tails about the "sins and practices" you refer to.

Faithful Reader, Indiana. 1. Why did Jacob fail to train all his children to be good men? He was one of God's chosen. Doesn't this prove that it is impossible to train children up to be true Christians? 2. Is the world getting bet- ter or worse? 3. Isn't the use of profanity becoming more general as the world grows older?

1. Josephus, the Jewish historian, says that Jacob's sons were good men until their father's evident partiality to Joseph excited their envy and led to many troubles. It shows the dangers and discord that may be caused in a family by such preferences. 2. There are many evidences that it is growing better. The spread of the Gospel, the growth of fraternal feeling among the nations, the in- crease of philanthropy and benevolence, all indicate that the Christlike spirit is making progress. 3. We believe not. A few genera- tions ago swearing was very common among all classes. In Elizabeth's reign in England, there was in circulation a manual of polite swearing, prescribing various forms of objur- gation and malediction. Such a thing would not be tolerated to-day.

J. S. R., Columbia, S. C. We are taught to despise jealous people; what then is the meaning of the statement (Ex. 20: 5), "I the Lord thy God am a jealous God."

The words were addressed to a people prone to the idea that they could worship the idols of the heathen while professing to be God's people. Idol worship in those days was indescribably vile, associated with the most loathsome vices. It was necessary to warn them that they could not combine idol- worship with that of Jehovah. We speak of a man as jealous when he entertains unfound- ed suspicions of his wife's fidelity. God is not a jealous God in that sense, but he is rightly insistent, as is a husband, on the duty of absolute fidelity.

S. M. B., Philadelphia. Your conscience must decide. You may find an opportunity to do some good where you are. If not, and you are in doubt, seek another place at the first opportunity.

J. C. Van D., Wellston, O. You should put the matter before a good lawyer. As you state it, the act would seem to be a strange and irregular one; but there may be mitigating circumstances.

Evangelist Peter Cartwright

From a reader of this journal, Miss Emma S. Emerich, of Beardstown, Ill., we have re- ceived this letter:

Seeing a picture of the Rev. Peter Cartwright in your paper, I enclose a correct likeness of the great Western preacher, as I often have seen him, heard him preach, and often shook hands with him. I know this to be just like him. This picture has been in my keeping about fifteen years. I forget what paper or book it was cut from. In a sermon at the dedication of Griggs' Chapel Mr. Cartwright spoke of his old age, and said he never had in all his life worn a beard.

LACQUERET

Brightens up your old furniture, covers the scratches and bruises, and brings back anew the lustrous finish of the wood. Chairs, tables, floors, every bit of woodwork in the house needs Lacqueret to keep it fresh and bright. You throw away only broken things when you have Lacqueret—the rest you keep as beautiful as new. There is no substitute, nothing but Lacqueret will do the work to your satisfaction. It does not peel, crack or fade. You ap- ply it yourself and it dries over night.

In convenient cans from one gallon to half pint in Rich Red, Rosewood, Moss Green, Light Oak, Dark Oak, Mahogany, Walnut, Cherry and Clear.

You can get Lacqueret at any good store that handles paints and varnishes. If you have any difficulty, let us know.

Our interesting book, "The Dainty Dec- orator," gives many useful suggestions for home decoration. "Little Miss Lacqueret's Drawing Book" will delight the children. Sent free on receipt of stamp. Address Dept. 15.

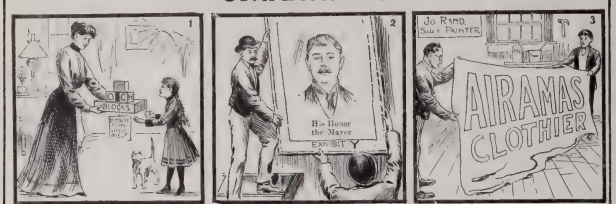
OUR SUNDAY HOUR WITH THE LITTLE FOLKS

COMPETITION 34



What three proper names mentioned in Scripture do these pictures represent?

Write "Competition 34" plainly across the top of a postal card or sheet of paper; next, your name, age and address; then the answers. For each of the three answers employ but one word—the proper name which you think the pictures represent. Don't quote Scripture passages; simply state the name. Below the answer, write, in not over twenty words, what, in your judgment, are the most important facts concerning the subject of the first of these pictures? Read the rules given below.

RULES AND PRIZES

Contests are not open to competitors over fourteen years of age. Do not send two solutions. There is no objection to asking the help of others, but each competitor must send in the answers in his or her own handwriting. Should you use paper instead of a postal card, be sure to write on the envelope in which you enclose your answer "Competition 34." Write on one side of paper only.

Prizes—For the best answer to Competition 34, a handsome silver watch, lady's or gentleman's. For the second best answer, our Smith-Peloubet Bible Dictionary; the third, How to Know the Wild Flowers, a beautiful illustrated book, by Mrs. William Starr Dana; for the fourth, Mr. Chupes and Miss Jenny, the Life Story of Two Robins, by Effie Bignell. For the next best answer from each State, territory and Canadian province sending meritorious responses to competitions, a beautiful book as consolation prize.

All answers must be mailed not later than April 13. Address, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Little Folks' Department, Bible House, N. Y.

Announcement of Prize-Winners in Competition of March 4

Answers to Competition 23, in our issue of March 4, are, Picture Puzzle, 1. Pharaoh; 2. Saul. Answers to Competition 24, "Curious Questions," are: 1. The ages of only two women are definitely stated in the Bible. Sarah, at the time of her death was 127 years old (Gen. 23: 1). Anna, the prophetess, was about eighty-four when the infant Saviour was presented in the Temple (Lu. 2: 37). Jairus' daughter's age is given as twelve (Lu. 8: 42), but she would be considered a child rather than a woman. 2. When the "posts went with the letters," from Hezekiah and his princes proclaiming that the Passover (which had not been kept for a long time, because of the indifference or prohibition of idolatrous kings), should be held, many "laughed them to scorn" (II. Chron. 30: 10). 3. When God promised blessings to the heathen among whom Abraham should go (Gen. 12: 3). When the Lord blessed Potiphar's house for "Joseph's sake" (Gen. 39: 5). When, after their worship of the golden calf, the Lord consented still to lead Israel, because Moses had found grace in his sight (Ex. 33: 17). When the ship bearing Paul towards Rome, was saved with all on board, because Paul "must be brought before Cæsar," and because God had given him all that had sailed with him (Acts 27: 24). 4. The mother of Rebekah (Gen. 24: 53). Her husband was Bethuel, the son of Nahor (Gen. 24: 47). Nahor being Abraham's brother, Bethuel was his nephew. Another instance is that of Achsah (Joshua 15: 16-19), but in that case the woman was enriched by Caleb as his daughter. Lack of space forbids publication of essays.

For the best answer to "Picture Puzzles" of March 4, H. C. Emrich, Buchanan, Iowa, receives a silver watch; for the best answer to "Curious Questions," of same date, Florence L. Beggs, South Bethlehem, N. Y., receives a silver watch. Each of the following receives a book:

What a Class of Girls Did

This letter, from young readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, explains itself:

ROMULUS, MICH., March 17.

Kindly accept the amount enclosed ($5.25), given for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Finland Famine Fund by Class No. 4 of Romulus M. E. Sunday School. Our class, a class of eight girls from fourteen to sixteen years of age, subscribe for two subscriptions of your paper, and when we read about the starving Finns we decided to raise some money to send to their relief. We had a "Conundrum-in-a-peanut-shell" social, and cleared this amount. We all enjoy reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and we thought the picture gallery lovely. "The Horse Fair" is my favorite. I gave Papa a Red Letter Bible for a Christmas present, and he thinks it is lovely. Yours truly,

THE EASTER GUEST

By Mary Lowe Dickinson

I KNEW Thou wert coming, O Lord Divine,
I felt in the sunlight a softened shine,
And a murmur of welcome I thought I heard,
In the ripple of brooks and the chirp of bird;
And the bursting buds and the springing grass
Seemed to be waiting to see Thee pass;
And the sky, and the sea, and the throbbing sod
Pulsed and thrilled to the touch of God.

I knew Thou wert coming, O Love Divine,
To gather the world's heart up to Thine;
I knew the bonds of the rock hewn grave
Were riven, that, living, Thy life might save.
But blind and wayward I could not see
Thou wert coming to dwell with me, e'en me;
And my heart o'erburdened with care and sin,
Had no fair chambers to take Thee in:

Not one clean spot for Thy foot to tread,
Not one pure pillow to rest Thy head;
There was nothing to offer, no bread, no wine,
No oil of joy in this heart of mine;
And yet the light of Thy kingly face
Illumed for Thyself, a small, dark place,
And I crept to the spot by Thy smile made sweet,
And tears came ready to wash Thy feet.

Now let me come nearer, O Lord Divine,
Make in my soul for Thyself a shrine;
Cleanse, till the desolate place shall be Fit for a dwelling, dear Lord, for Thee.
Rear, if Thou wilt, a throne in my breast,
Reign, I will worship and serve my guest.
While Thou art in me—and in Thee I abide—
No end can come to the Easter tide.

and the children stole out of the little house like ghosts. They crept into the church, and garlanded the pulpit, and made the table in front of the altar most beautiful with lilies. Then, full of excitement, they softly went home.

Lonesome Ford always wanted to hear Mr. Bond's Easter sermon. Indeed, he was a man with a message, and therefore he never failed in having people to listen to him. But when he stepped inside his church door and saw the flowers, such flowers as had adorned the church at home, the day he married Helen Sherman, his eyes were dim with tears. He opened the Bible and read from the Song of Solomon: "My beloved spake and said unto me, Rise up, my love, my fair one, and come away. For, lo! the winter is past; the rain is over and gone. The flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds has come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land. Arise, my love, my fair one, and come away!"

"Frank Bond," said Miss Perkins, the day before she went home, three months later, "you should have a wider field. There are people in D—— with souls to be saved. Won't you leave this endlessly hard work, and take up something at home if the way is opened?"

"No, Charlotte Perkins, not while the Lord makes it plain to me that I am needed here at Lonesome Ford."

"I shall leave Lulu here to take care of you awhile, and carry Helen back to civilization," was her reply.

"You may do that. I would like my wife to have a holiday. She has borne the burden and the heat, and often has been stronger than I. God bless her. Yes, she may have a vacation from Lonesome Ford, but I'll stand in my lot still, for God has given me health and strength."

And, valiant for the truth, Frank Bond is at Lonesome Ford yet.

Answered Prayers

M. M. B., Lowell, Vt., writes:

A dear friend and her husband, for whom I have long prayed, have now begun to live the Christian life, and I would say to all, trust in God. He surely will answer prayer.

A sister, Brandon, Manitoba, writes:

I wish to acknowledge in your paper the answer to my prayer to God to save my brother from a terrible sin. If God answers another prayer of mine I shall acknowledge it also in this paper.

64 Slightly Damaged Sets for Christian Herald Readers

Upon taking stock recently, we find that we have on hand a few slightly damaged sets of the last edition of the "World's Best Music." For all practical purposes these sets are as good as new. Here and there a leaf is slightly soiled or a binding a little rubbed, but there are no torn pages. Sixty-four of these remaining sets have been reserved for readers of the "Christian Herald," and we offer them, as long as they last, at little more than the cost of making and handling. The coupon cut from this advertisement will bring you a set for examination, and you may return it if it is not satisfactory. Every lover of music will appreciate this opportunity to obtain the world's greatest collection of music at almost cost price.

The World's Best Music

SIZE OF VOLUMES, 9 x 12 INCHES

$1.00 a Month Payments

The "Library of the World's Best Music" is the most complete and satisfactory collection of music in existence. It contains 2200 pages of sheet music carefully selected by an experienced corps of music editors. If you were to buy the music it contains one piece at a time, it would cost you over $200.00. The sets are in eight large volumes 9 x 12 inches in size, attractively bound in half-leather or cloth. By means of an ingenious device in binding the volumes open flat at the piano. The set contains over 400 illustrations, including numerous chromatic art plates printed in colors.

IF YOU ARE A PIANIST you will find this collection of music invaluable. It contains 300 instrumental selections by the best composers, including popular and operatic melodies, dances, funeral marches, and classic and romantic piano music. Such composers are represented as Paderewski, Gounod, Sullivan, Mascagni, Wagner, Mozart, Balfe and Liszt.

IF YOU LIKE MUSIC but do not play yourself, you cannot make a better present to your wife or daughter than a set of this musical Library. It means evening after evening of pleasure, for it furnishes in the most compact and simple form all the world's greatest music. This collection is to music what the encyclopedia is to knowledge: the best of all properly proportioned.

IF YOU ARE A SINGER the "World's Best Music" will increase your repertoire. It will place in your hands 300 of the best old and new songs, duets, trios and quartets, arranged for all voices and for piano accompaniment. The collection embraces all the old songs of your childhood days, besides the new and popular melodies of the last few years.

IF YOU ARE A STUDENT of music you will find this Library more than half a musical education. The selections have been made by Rubinstein, De Koven, Victor Herbert, Helen Ketterlin-Johnson, Gerrit Smith and others equally well known in the musical world. As a musical encyclopedia it is unexcelled, and contains 500 biographies of musicians and 400 portraits.

Every Home in Which There is a Piano should possess this splendid musical library, for it doubles the value of a piano as an entertainer. As long as the slightly damaged sets last, they will be sold to "Christian Herald" readers at $21.00 for sets in half-leather binding and $17.00 for the cloth binding—and you may pay in small payments of $1 a month. The amount saved by securing one of the remaining sets is shown by the fact that this musical library sells regularly at $48.00 and $36.00. Send us the coupon to-day if you wish to secure a set at these prices. We feel confident that you will keep the set after you have examined it, but if it is not entirely satisfactory, you may return it to us at our expense. Do not forget to send the coupon, as this offer is made only to "Christian Herald" readers.

THE ELEVENTH HOUR

The Final Opportunity for Repentance and Reconciliation and Labor

By Mrs. M. Baxter

OUR Lord in that solemn parable of the Laborers in the vineyard (Matt. 20: 6, 7) represents the householder going forth at the eleventh hour and telling the idlers to go into his vineyard. The eleventh hour! For the waiting ones in whose hearts the Day-star has arisen, it is the last hour before midnight, when the Bridegroom cometh! For the laborers, the last hour before sundown, the last hour of opportunities, the last hour before the reckoning, the last hour before rest. For the Church of Christ on earth, the last hour before that "redemption of the body," when there shall be the manifestation or revealing of the sons of God! The hour for which the groaning creation waits, to be "delivered from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the children of God!" (Rom. 8: 19-22). It is the hour of our groaning, and of the groaning of the Spirit who dwells in us; but also the hour of our hope, as we see the rising of the Morning Star. For the Jew it is the hour which announces that the time of Israel's deliverance approaches, when all things that are written must be fulfilled.

To the thoughtless world the eleventh hour sounds the funeral knell of all their hopes of peace and security here on earth. For the "children of light and of the day" "the morning cometh"; but "also the night" (Isa. 21: 12) for the children of this world! "They have not spoken according to this word:" "To the law and to the testimony," therefore "there is no mourning for them" (Isa. 8: 20). "The Light is come into the world, but they have loved the darkness rather than the light, for their works were evil" (John 3: 19, R.V.): they have had their choice—"Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap" (Gal. 6: 7, 8); very soon there can be no appeal. "When they shall be hungry, they shall fret themselves, and curse by their king, and by their God, and turn their faces upward: and they shall look unto the earth, and behold distress and darkness, the gloom of anguish; and into thick darkness they shall be driven away" (Isa. 8: 21, 22). O how crazy are the children of this world! They utterly ignore their responsibility to know what God says to them in the sacred Scriptures, while it is by these very Scriptures they will be judged in the last day! "He that rejecteth me, and receiveth not my sayings, hath One that judgeth him: the Word that I speak, the same shall judge him in the last day" (John 12: 48).

The eleventh hour, and Christians idle! Opportunities slipping by—priceless opportunities, never to occur again; and Christians neglecting them! "Why stand ye here all the day idle?" Because no man hath hired you? "Cease ye from man"; another Voice says to you: "Go ye also into the vineyard"; no agreement for reward. What is the value of one hour, and that just before the day ends? It is grace, it is an unspeakable privilege, to be permitted, and permitted so late in the day, to work in the vineyard. But it is now or never: "The night cometh, when no man can work" (John 9: 4). How near we may be to the hour when our Lord shall come we know not; but the precious service he gives is "till he come." Do you say, "My service is not worth any reward; it is not worth offering to the Master; but if he will use me, whom men have rejected as unfit, here I am, and I seek no reward"? What says he? This one shall be first rewarded! Why? Because his eye is not on the reward, but on the privilege of being permitted to serve his Master. He loves free-will service. Perhaps the eleventh hour, the present time, may bring out thousands of just such laborers.

What work can I do? Some who have been "standing all the day idle" are finding out that they can join with one or two others, and pray, and a new joy and power has come into their life. There is nothing they can glory in, nothing for which others can praise them in this, nothing in which they can have self-satisfaction; and yet the Master is pleased, and they know it. Some very feeble Christians are beginning to be conscious that they are, in some very small way, entering into the thoughts of God, and helping forward the salvation of souls; and the littleness of their lives gives way before the greatness of a service in which they are come so often face to face with God.

And God is indeed hearing prayer, and from many places in different countries news is coming of the working of the Holy Spirit on the hearts of men. We hear of wonderful things in India, of brokenness and confession of sin by missionaries and Indian evangelists, of many converted and baptized, of a testimony meeting lasting seven hours, in which most of the time was taken up with heart-broken confessions of sin. Feuds are ended; lives wonderfully changed. "This is the finger of God" in answer to prayer. We bow down in deep adoration. Let us pray on in faith and in self-surrender, leaving the Holy Spirit to teach us how to pray. But let us not be astonished if God works in ways we have not expected. We are praying for, and waiting for, a world-wide revival; God has put it into our hearts, and given us the courage to pray.

AN AUSTRALIAN PREACHER

CORDIAL welcome will undoubtedly be given by the American churches to the Australian evangelist, Rev. Jesse Mayo, who has come here with the unction upon him of the great Australian revival, in which Dr. Torrey took so prominent a part. Mr. Mayo has learned by personal experience what united prayer for a revival can do, and is prepared to render help in bringing our churches to a similar realization of the blessing, which has stirred his own country from sea to sea.

Mr. Mayo has been associated for several years with the Evangelization Association of Australia, which planned and executed the national union of churches in petitions to the Throne of Grace for the pouring out of the Holy Spirit which preceded the great revival. He was one of the first ministers in Australia to take up in earnest the movement which culminated in the revival and he labored energetically in it to the close. Exhausted and physically depleted by manifold labors, he found a period of rest absolutely necessary. He therefore took a voyage to England. No sooner, however, did he arrive there, than the National Council of Free Churches applied to him to organize a united evangelistic work. He held services as arranged by the Council, in Yorkshire, Cumberland, and various towns in the south of England.

The value of his services was heartily appreciated. Rev. F. B. Meyer wrote: "I know Mr. Mayo as an earnest evangelist of good standing and character, who has been much used in helping believers and in the conversion of the ungodly. I commend him to Christian ministers and others who want the help of a good reaper. His later work has been done in connection with our Central Free Church Council."

Rev. Thomas Law, Secretary of the Free Church Council, writes: "I hear that Rev. Jesse Mayo is going to America for the conduct of evangelistic missions. I most heartily commend him. He has conducted most successful missions for our councils."

Mr. Mayo is now holding services at Toledo, O. Letters addressed to him in the care of Rev. G. W. Belsey, 226 Kenilworth avenue, Toledo, O., will reach him.

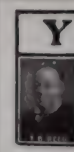
Their specialty, "Prosperity Corn," is well named.

Your Choice of these Booklets will be sent you. Complimentary



"Something for nothing" is a fond desire even in these confining and prosaic days. We have something we want to send for nothing to every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and we profess to be profound fools if you, and that you just as well as we, expect to receive it without the slightest thought or expenditure. We leave the waffle business to the fraternities of the one "greatest day" and the one "greatest meal" of the year, and we know that if you receive and read this you will be one of the most delighted readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that we have had since the days of Noah. Read a unique offering of modern eloquence, and we know that if you receive and read any one of the six brilliant After-Dinner Speeches, Lectures and Addresses contained in the Library of the World's best spoken thoughts, you will want to send for the whole set at once, and would probably want to quite as bad should you have found your own name among the others. Then, too, the point we make is, we are going to send, upon receipt of 6 two-cent stamps to cover postage, your choice of the booklets described below. Let us add a thought: Read the first page and see how you like your book before you send for it. In these Booklets, on the MODERN ELOQUENCE, each speech is given in full, just as it was delivered.

MERCHANTS AND MINISTERS

THE BENCH AND THE BAR
By Joseph Hodges Choate
THE MEDICAL PROFESSION
By Samuel Hallowell Ward
INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION
By William Maxwell Evarts

Here are topics that are timely and vital in turn no matter what your occupation may be.

It is not necessary now to allude to the eloquence and intellectual Beecher. Nearly before was his theory that the church and the store have a common interest in the foundation of morality as applicable to conditions.

Ambassador Choate was a lawyer before he was a diplomat, and whatever he has to say of his profession is replete with humor and truth.

Dr. Ward's opinions of physicians and their practice are subscribed with levity while containing at the same time much food for thought.

As for William M. Evarts, no man stood higher as an exponent of law and few excel him in beauty of expression.

There is instruction as well as entertainment in these speeches.

ACRES OF DIAMONDS
By Russell Herman Conwell

His wonderfully notable address in Concord previous to Conwell preaching it over and over again by thousands of times, and, wherever in America or Europe, in the United States or Canada, or between these lands such is heard, He must possess some marvelous secret of success.

His word-picture lectures, and in the greatest opportunity lies the secret. And realized. It introduces no theories with abstract principles and fanciful. He is well able to furnish these illustrations, for during his long lifetime has been an intimate friend of the great masters of national thought, and with the insights of the infidels in the most notable and professional worlds.

This lecture has delivered the last dozen of thousands of listeners, and no man who desires to succeed in life should let pass by this opportunity to read the whole lecture free of charge.

NEW ENGLAND WEATHER
By Mark Twain
A Blend of CAVALIER and PURITAN
By Hon. Joseph H. Choate
CAUSES OF UNPOPULARITY
By Henry Labouchere

Here are three speeches on subjects that will interest every one. The "Talk" is worth many times the amount of the entire book.

Mark Twain has long since captured the world by his wit and humor, and his speech on New England weather is a wonder.

Joseph Choate presents the principles that the United States is a blend of these two elements, and the subsequent development of the American people.

Henry Labouchere, the famous English statesman, discusses the causes of unpopularity, and his remarks are as applicable here as to England.

ENEMIES OF THE CHILDREN

How Corruptors of Youth are Thwarted by the Society for the Suppression of Vice . . . .

QUESTION I. Do you know how many boys and girls there are in the United States?

ANSWER. Hon. William C. Hunt, Chief Statistician of Population at Washington, D. C., reports as enrolled in the last (1900) census, 36,727,363 persons twenty-one years of age or under.

CAN you comprehend this multitude of youthful souls? Let us help you. If you should attend at a given point for one year, and each day have passed before you one hundred thousand of these children and youth, at the end of the year there would remain 227,363 that had not passed.

But this is not all. Between the ages of twenty-one and twenty-three years, there are several millions more. This means that more than one-half of the entire population of the United States are twenty-three years of age or under.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK

The making or unmaking of the character of the rising generation means the making or unmaking of the future welfare of this nation. Our destiny is bound up with the integrity and virtue of our youth. Every child is a character builder. Like storage batteries, they are being charged for future weal or woe. Every young heart is eagerly sought after by the Spirit of Evil. He seeks to convert it into a commissary department, wherein he may store up and hold in reserve for future requisition insidious and deadly influences, to damn the soul.

In the heart of every boy and girl there is a weaving department, wherein the looms of the reproductive faculties of the mind are ever kept busy, weaving entertainment. It is a breeding-place for secret thoughts. Corrupt thoughts are the nest-eggs of evil habits. The devil's motto is, "Anything to turn the thoughts of the heart away from God," and when he can successfully link the imagination and fancy—the reproductive faculties of the mind—with the sensual natuie, he has secured a recruit for his kingdom. A soul so cursed in youth, has had hung up in the chamber of imagery in his heart matters which he can never forget; and which will be a perpetual menace to spiritual peace and development.

QUESTION II. Can these millions of youthful souls be reached by corrupting influences?

ANSWER. Yes, readily. The mails of the United States furnish an ever-ready means of reaching the youth in all communities, and in all ranks of society. The worst villain, under the sanctity of the seal, may send by mail, unknown to parent or teacher, the vilest matter to the purest child. Express companies and other common carriers furnish additional facilities to these disseminators of moral contagion.

It is to check the growth of evils that are calculated to undermine the innocence and happiness of the children of America, that the Society for the Suppression of Vice is now bending every energy at its command. These evils are legion. They include objectionable publications of all sorts, and a great variety of picture machines that cater to the most depraved tastes. In 1872, there was found an organized business for the spread of immorality. There were then no laws adequate to stop these evils, and the country was flooded with a mass of vicious literature, especially aimed at the young. The New York Society for the Suppression of Vice has since prosecuted many of the offenders, with the result that they have been convicted and imprisoned.

During the past year 116 arrests have been made by the Society's officers, 9 convictions secured, and over 2 tons of impure literature, pictures, etc., seized and destroyed.

Summing up the entire record of the Society for the Suppression of Vice since it began in 1872, it has made 2,654 arrests and seized 84 tons of matter, the latter including books, papers, prints, negatives, electroplates, type, steel and copper-plate engravings, woodcuts, circulars, letters, names and addresses, lottery and pool tickets.

Many of the old contributors to the Society have died, and funds are lacking to work with. It requires help to keep up the campaign against impurity. Are not the millions of youth in our own country worth saving? And should not these facts presented above awaken a lively interest in their behalf? Good men and women should supply the sinews of war, to sustain and perpetuate this fight for the purity and morality of the boys and girls of America.

All who are interested in the Society and who desire to aid its work, should address Mr. Anthony Comstock, 41 Park Row, N.Y.

The Transformation of Old Phil

AN impressive ceremony took place recently in the Old Jerry McAuley Mission, under the Brooklyn Bridge, in Water street, New York. The scene was remarkable, even for the McAuley Mission, where so many unusual things happen. In a casket in front of the platform, almost covered with flowers and wreaths and other floral tokens of love, lay the calm, peaceful features of old Phil McGuire. It seemed as though he had just fallen asleep, so peaceful and serene was his face. Nothing that the observer could see would indicate the tempestuous career that this man had passed through during his long life of seventy-two years. The crowd, which filled every inch of the room, and still kept coming so that the doors had to be locked, was distinctly a mission crowd. In no other place on earth, but in a mission in New York, could such a heterogeneous crowd be found. Some had come from long distances, though old Phil was no public character.

It is ten years since Phil McGuire came into the McAuley Mission one night, in such a ragged, dirty, drunken condition that he was disgusting. He had been brought up from childhood in the Catholic faith, but had departed far away from its teachings. He was a thief from childhood, and had been arrested a number of times before he was ten years of age. He spent two terms in the Juvenile Asylum. Finally he ran away, and made a voyage on a whaler, and was gone three years. He had served altogether twenty years behind prison bars, in several terms, for burglary. He sat in the same seat in Sing Sing prison with Jerry McAuley, when the latter was aroused by the tremendous preaching of "Awful Gardner," which brought Jerry to repentance. But the message that brought Jerry into light had no effect on Phil. He kept on in his bad way after his release, and at the age of sixty-two he was as bad as ever.

On the night when he came to the Mission, he had just spent the ten cents received from a pawnbroker for his last shirt, with a saloonkeeper for a drink of whiskey. That night, when the usual invitation was given to any who wanted to be saved, to come to the altar, for us to pray with and for them, about fifteen wrecks of humanity responded, and among them was old Phil McGuire. He knelt with the others and his voice shook with emotion as he uttered the prayer of the Publican, "God be merciful to me a sinner." His prayer was heard. Mercy came to him in a degree that he could not understand. That night was the turning point in his career. It was the beginning of a new life. Old Phil became a changed character. He stopped drinking, gave up all his evil ways, and dropped all his old associations.

At Phil's age and with his record, it was not easy for him to obtain honest employment. He was frequently in hard straits, but he never wavered in his determination to starve rather than go back to crooked ways. When we needed a janitor for the mission, Phil pleaded for the job, and we took him on, and he was with us several years. Never was there a more faithful, earnest worker. He took an interest in all our efforts, besides doing the duties of his office. On the day of his death, he was as cheerful as usual, and, at the close of our meeting, distributed tickets for lodgings to some homeless men. He was closing up the mission for the night, when he was seized with sudden illness. Mrs. Lamont, our missionary, went to his assistance, but it was clear that the end was near. He was evidently anxious about something, and now and again tried to raise his hand, that was benumbed by approaching death, to his vest pocket. Mrs. Lamont helped him, and with some difficulty he drew out two one-dollar bills. "Books," he said feebly. He had sold that night two copies of my book, Down in Water Street, and the last act of this old converted thief was to square the financial transaction. A few minutes afterwards he peacefully breathed his last. Such an end to such a life is a testimony to the wonderful power of the Spirit. Does any one believe that the old glorious Gospel of the transforming power of Jesus has lost its power? If so, let him come down to Water Street and see some of the Trophies of Grace there, and they will change their minds. S. H. HADLEY.

Free to All Housekeepers

THE "1900" BALL-BEARING FAMILY WASHER

A Wonderfully Simple Invention That Cuts in Half Time, Labor and Expense of Washing Clothes.

No More Rubbing or Stooping—Monday's Drudgery No Longer to Be Dreaded.

Every Householder in the Land Can Have One FREE.

In order to prove to the most sceptical that the "1900" Ball Bearing Family Washer is unquestionably the greatest Home Labor Saving Machine ever invented, we will send you one absolutely free without deposit or advance payment of any kind, freight paid, on 30 days' TRIAL. If you like it, you can pay for it either in cash or on the installment plan at the end of the 30 days' trial. If you don't like it, all you have to do is to ship it back to us at our expense. You run no risk, no expense, no obligations whatever.

The "1900" Ball-Bearing Washer is beyond doubt the greatest labor-saving machine ever invented for family use. Entirely new principle. It is simplicity itself. There are no wheels, paddles, rockers, cranks or complicated machinery. It revolves on bicycle ball bearings, making it by far the easiest running washer on the market. No strength required; a child can operate it.

No more stooping, rubbing, boiling of clothes. Hot water and soap all that are needed. It will wash large quantities of clothes (no matter how soiled) perfectly clean in six minutes. Impossible to injure the most delicate fabrics. Saving in wear and tear of clothes, to say nothing of the saving of soap and materials, pays for machine in a short time. Don't be prejudiced. This is entirely different from and far superior to any other washing machine ever made.

The "1900" Washer is not a cheaply made machine. It is constructed of the very best materials; it is handsome, compact and strong, and will last a lifetime.

We receive constantly thousands of flattering letters from people who have used the "1900" Washer. They are all unsolicited and must naturally be sincere. We shall be pleased to send to any one writing for it our book of testimonials, which are guaranteed to be genuine and exact copies of originals on file at our office. Among the many thousands on file, we reproduce the following:

Peoria, Ill., Sept. 2, 1902

I have given the "Washer a good trial, now with my washing and ironing. It is the best I have ever used for blankets, as fast. I think it is the best all around washer I ever heard of. I would not do without mine.

MRS. LILLIAN SELLERS

Washington, D.C., Sept. 8, 1902

You will find inclosed payment for the "1900" Washer. It fully comes up to our expectations and is all that you have claimed for it. We take great pleasure in recommending it to all who want to avail themselves of one of the greatest labor saving devices of modern times for domestic purposes.

WM. F. SALLER

East Plymouth, Ohio, Feb. 25, 1902

P. O. Ashtabula, O.

We have been using the "1900" Washer since May 15, 1900. Have done over 1,200 washings and I think it is good for as many more. We do family work from Ashtabula. We have used 3 different machines, and the "1900" beats them all for good and fast work and durability.

GEO. N. BURNETT.

Hart, Mich., August 25, 1902

Please find inclosed money order to pay for my washer in full. We are well pleased with the washer. A great many people have looked at it. My mother, 83 years old, and I, who am a cripple in a wheeled chair, have done our washing by it for the last three weeks.

MRS. ALICE ROUSE.

Kansas City, Mo., May 14, 1902

I have given your washer a fair trial. It is the best washer I ever saw. It has washed our heavy blankets with ease. I washed them last Spring and rubbed more than an hour, and yet they had to go through again, but the "1900" Washer cleaned them thoroughly. We do our washing very quick, and have no tired and worn-out feeling as of old. I wish every lady had a washer.

MRS. J. L. BANNER, 4203 Troost Ave.

It costs nothing to try the "1900" Washer. It is sent to any one absolutely FREE on 30 days' trial. We pay freight both ways. No money required in advance. Write at once; do it now, so you wont forget it, and a "1900" Washing Machine will be sent you free of all charges. Address "1900" Washer Co., 33 K. State Street, Binghamton, N. Y.

ARTISTIC MONUMENTS

DUE respect for our departed loved ones demands that we erect Artistic and Enduring Memorials. Marble has proved an unfortunate failure. Moss-grown, broken and tumbled-down it is the abomination of the cemetery. Sometimes pushed under, entirely. Usually, too, soon gets discolored, moss-grown, cracks, crumbles and decays. Besides it is very expensive.

WHITE BRONZE Monuments are Cheaper and Infinitely BETTER. They are strictly everlasting. Rust, corrosion and moss growth are IMPOSSIBILITIES. They CANNOT crumble from the action of frost. WHITE BRONZE is of finer artistic and expressive lines than Marble. Then why not investigate it? It has been on the market for over twenty-five years and won established success.

It has been adopted for more than a hundred public monuments and by thousands of delighted individuals, all over the country. Many granite dealers have used White Bronze in preference to granite for their own burial plots.

We have hundreds of beautiful designs at prices from $11 to $1,000. We deal direct and deliver everywhere. Distance is no obstacle. Write us for designs and information if you are thinking about erecting a monument. It costs nothing and puts you under no obligation whatever. SYMPATHY

Far, far away,
A fair-haired child is pleading, all in vain
For bread to ease the cruel hunger pain
Each weary day.
Its soft blue eye
Is dimmed with tears, its hollow cheek is pale
Where once the roses bloomed, and strength will fail
Until it die.
Unless we send
Help quickly to the little suffering one.
O do not wait, but ere another sun
Brings near that end.
Search well your heart.
God asks to give your help to those who need.
And His rich blessing on your kindly deed
Will ne'er depart. —E. M. L.

FOUR WARNINGS*

Common Faults against which the Apostle Puts Christians on their Guard

WHILE Christianity is a religion of broad principles, Christ never intended that it should be lax in details. He warned his followers that their righteousness must exceed that of the Scribes and Pharisees, the most punctilious people of his time, otherwise they could not be his disciples. With the principles of Christianity enshrined in their hearts, it should not be necessary to tell them they must not do this or that. They should know at once what was inconsistent with those principles and avoid it. Nevertheless, hints are given here and there in the Bible, to show them how those principles are to be applied. Four such hints are given in the passages cited in connection with the Topic.

They touch the Christian's conduct in relation to others. They are, however, in close connection with his conduct toward God and his relations to him, and are indeed founded upon them. The first duty inculcated is humility. He is not to be proud, arrogant, conceited. The second duty is tolerance; he is not to cherish unreasonable prejudice. The third is kindly feeling; he is not to grudge others their advancement or prosperity. The fourth is fair speaking; he is not to be uncharitable nor censorious, nor to speak evil of others. These are four beacon lights, which are to show the Christian the dangers which he will find in his course through life, against which he must be on his guard. He must not be heedless, otherwise the natural propensity of humanity may lead him into evil. If he has a right sense of his position before God, of the conditions under which he is looking for salvation, he is not likely to fall in any of these particulars. It is one of the surest proofs of conversion that the heart is drawn out in love for others. The man is conscious of a new quickening of kindly and benevolent feelings, and when he remains under their influence, he is little likely to feel jealous, or envious, or quarrelsome, or censorious. Nevertheless, those faults are so common in society, and so easily enter the heart, that the warning is not unneeded. If it were always heeded, what a delightful association the church would be! It would be so attractive, that it would be a living epistle, which even the world would esteem and applaud.

*Topic of the Epworth League for April 19. Rom. 12: 16; Prov. 6: 34; Phil. 2: 3.

THE LORD'S DAY*

The Institution which has Superseded the Burdensome Jewish Sabbath

VERY significant is it that Christ should have been teased and harassed by charges of breaking the Sabbath. It seems that there were men in his day, as there are in ours, who, delighting in literalism and formalism, are ever on the watch for the commission of acts by others, which may be held as technical breaches of the law of the Sabbath. These men were a nuisance in their time, as their representatives are now. Sticklers for the letter, regardless of the spirit, they would, if they could have their way, force every one to keep the Sabbath in a narrow and burdensome way. The rules laid down by these men in Christ's time were carried to an absurd extreme. No man might carry a handkerchief or use a staff on the Sabbath, because it would be carrying a burden. No one might walk on the grass, because that was a species of threshing. If chickens were fed, no particle of grain must be left on the ground, because that might be sowing, and there were hundreds of such prohibitions. God never meant the Sabbath, which he ordained for the good of man, to become a burden to him.

In the time of the Apostles, there was a new effort made to fasten on Christians the burdens as to the Sabbath, which had harassed the Jews. This was probably due to the change of day. The Apostle Paul was appealed to, and he promptly brushed the silly and stupid cavils away, by directing his converts (Col. 2: 16) to "let no man judge you in respect of a holy day or of the Sabbath." This is a good rule for modern Christians to adopt when they are urged to give up keeping the Lord's Day, on which we commemorate the resurrection of our Lord, and to keep the Jewish Sabbath, which commemorates the seventh day of creation.

The teaching of Christ as to the day lifts it to a higher plane altogether than is occupied by the literalists. He declared himself Lord of the Sabbath, and would not be hindered from doing good on that day. The Sabbath, he declared, "was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath." It is an opportunity God gives man to cultivate his higher nature; to quit for a time the affairs of the world and give his attention to the interests of the soul. So let us give up talking of the "Sabbath," a day of rest, and call it the "Lord's Day," a day consecrated to Christ and his service.

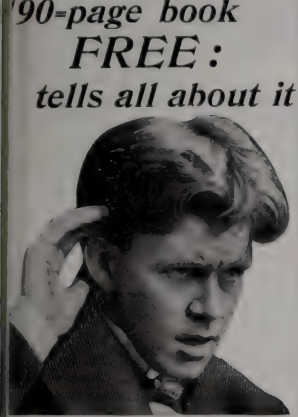
Deafness Overcome

Louisville man originates a simple little device that instantly restores the hearing—fits perfectly, comfortably and does not show.

90-page book FREE: tells all about it



Since the discovery of a Louisville man it is no nger necessary for any deaf person to carry a umpet, a tube or any such old-fashioned device, or it is now possible for any one to hear perfectly y a simple invention that fits in the ear and can ot be detected. The honor belongs to Mr. George I. Wilson, of Louisville, who was himself deaf and ow hears as well as any one. He calls it Wilson's ommon Sense Ear Drum, is built on the strictest cientific principles, containing no metal of any ind, and is entirely new in every respect. It is so mall that no one can see it, but nevertheless it ollects all sound waves and diverts them against he drum-head, causing you to hear perfectly. It ill do this even when the natural ear drums are artially or entirely destroyed, perforated, scarred, laxed or thickened. It fits any ear from childood to old age, and aside from the fact that it oes not show, it never causes the hearer irritation, nd can be used with comfort day or night.

It will relieve deafness whether acquired from atarrh, scarlet fever, typhoid or brain fever, measles, whooping cough, gathering in the ear, hocks from artillery or through accidents. It not nly relieves, but stays the progress of deafness and ll roaring and buzzing noises. It does this in a imple, sure and scientific way. The effect is mmediate.

Let every person who needs this at once send to he company for its 190-page book, which you can ave free. It describes and illustrates Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drums and contains many oona fide letters from numerous users in the United States, Canada, Mexico, England, Scotland, Ireand, Wales, Australia, New Zealand, Tasmania, ndia. These letters are from people in every staion of life—clergymen, physicians, lawyers, merhants, society ladies, etc—and tell the truth about he benefits to be derived from the use of this wonerful little device. You will find among them the names of people in your own town or State, and you re at liberty to write to any of them you wish and ecure their opinion as to the merits of the only cientific ear drums for restoring the hearing to its normal condition.

Write to-day and it will not be long before you are again hearing. Address, for the free book and convincing evidence, been deceived. So their reflections, as well as their faces, were sad.

As they walked, they were suddenly conscious that another was walking with them. They never could remember just when he came, but there he was, a kind and sympathetic fellow traveler, who inquired the cause of their sadness. Then they told him about Jesus, and how they had hoped that he should have redeemed Israel, but he had been taken by wicked hands, and slain on the cross. Three days ago all this had happened, and some women had been to the tomb that morning, and came back with the story of an empty grave, and a vision of angels who had told them that the Lord was risen. That the grave was empty they had proved, but their hearts were full of fear and doubt as to what had become of Jesus.

Then the wonderful stranger, who had about him an unique charm and fascination, which seemed to quiet their inmost souls, began to recall the prophecies to them. Scriptures they had never noted, or if they had, had found all dark and mysterious, this stranger brought to their attention, and on his lips they glowed with light upon the life and the death of Jesus.

Absorbed by his conversation, the time passed rapidly, and they soon stood before the door of Cleopas, and the stranger saluted them farewell, starting to go on. But they could not bear to see him go, and they begged him to come in, and stay with them. They went into the house, and soon gathered about the table for the evening meal. The stranger lifted his face toward heaven in prayer, and at that moment the veil fell away, and they saw that it was Jesus. They started forward with a glad cry, and he was gone. Cleopas and John Mark did not wait for supper. They had other food. They hurried back to Jerusalem to tell their friends what had happened to them. Mark was never willing to talk much about the experiences of that day. Years afterward, Cleopas gave Dr. Luke an account of it, in which he said that their hearts burned within them as Christ opened to them the Scriptures. But so sacred and holy was his memory of it all, that Mark contented himself by writing in his old age only these significant words, "After that he appeared in another form unto two of them, as they walked, and went into the country."

Good Housekeeping

Mr. J. C. Earl, who for many years has given considerable time and attention to the study of domestic accounts, has produced a book of instruction of some thirty pages for the use of housewives and young matrons. This little work gives in detail, and in the simplest possible manner, the subdivision and classification of domestic expenditure. It tells the housekeeper how to commence her account book, how to carry it on through the year, and how to close it at the end of that period. It is not a blank book for practical work, but a simple set of rules, very clearly expressed, which the housekeeper can easily follow out in her own account book. Interspersed through the book are examples of the several accounts—food, clothing, etc.,with the regular entries and rulings, showing a complete week's expenditures. It also contains many exceedingly interesting letters of comment from America's most prominent women, the whole forming a most attractive and readable little volume. Earl's Housekeeping ought to be in the hands of every housekeeper in the land, and should enter into the studies of every young girl on the brink of womanhood. We predict for it a wide popularity. Sent to any address for 25 cents. Address John C. Earl, 1,223 Bible House, New York.

QUAINT PSALMS for QUEER FOLK

By Rev. C. H. Yatman

PSALM CI—Noble Purpose Psalm

2. I will behave myself wisely in a perfect way. O when wilt thou come unto me? I will walk within my house with a perfect heart.

"O, WHEN WILT THOU COME UNTO ME?"

3. I will set no wicked thing before mine eyes: I hate the work of them that turn aside; it shall not cleave to me.

4. A froward heart shall depart from me.

It is a great thing to have a noble purpose, and Psalm CI. is the crystallization of aim that is God-like and good. The application of this to the present-day life of young men and women would revolutionize society. If applied to home and business life in general, civic redemption would be near.

PSALM CII
Psalm for the Destitute

2. Hide not thy face from me in the day when I am in trouble; incline thine ear unto me: in the day when I call answer me speedily.

"LIKE A PELICAN OF THE WILDERNESS"

3. For my days are consumed like smoke, and my bones are burned as a hearth.

4. My heart is smitten, and withered like grass; so that I forget to eat my bread.

5. By reason of the voice of my groaning my bones cleave to my skin.

6. I am like a pelican of the wilderness: I am like an owl of the desert.

Destitution is neighbor to Desolation and both are friendly to Death. Not a few folk in a sin-stricken world dwell in this Psalm and its experiences. Let the Christian with hope, light, love and friendship, like that of Christ, quickly visit them, and bring them from Psalm CII. to Psalm CIII.

PSALM CIII
Bread-and-Butter Psalm

2. Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits:

3. Who forgiveth all thine iniquities; who healeth all thy diseases;

"THY YOUTH IS RENEWED LIKE THE EAGLE'S"

4. Who redeemeth thy life from destruction; who crowneth thee with loving-kindness and tender mercies;

5. Who satisfieth thy mouth with good things; so that thy youth is renewed like the eagle's.

The writer of this Psalm knew the value of the blessings God gives us in this world. Very queer religion that, which cannot meet "the butcher, the baker, and the candlestick maker," with honor and honesty. Ripening harvests are a part of God's salvation. The cattle on a thousand hills are his and are for us. "Milk for babes, and meat for men" is only a half truth if limited to Scripture. Let us have full Gospel crops here—crowns hereafter.

PSALM CIV
Psalm for Weak Folk

13. He watereth the hills from his chambers: the earth is satisfied with the fruit of thy works.

"HE WATERETH THE HILLS"

14. He causeth the grass to grow for the cattle, and herb for the service of man: that he may bring forth food out of the earth;

15. And wine that maketh glad the heart of man, and oil to make his face to shine, and bread which strengtheneth man's heart.

Little faith folk, weak-kneed Christians, doubting Thomases and deserting disciples need the strength of this wonderful Psalm. It is fresh air and sunlight to sweat-shop people. A thorough reading of it is better than a dozen doctor's visits and drugs combined. It is like a voyage for one's health, or a visit to the country in spring.

THE NEW KIND

OF REAL ESTATE SERVICE

IF YOU WANT TO BUY OR SELL ANY KIND OF REAL ESTATE (OR BUSINESS) IN ANY SECTION OF THE UNITED STATES, YOU SURELY WANT THE KIND OF SERVICE I OFFER YOU—THE NEW KIND—THE KIND THAT HAS ENABLED ME TO BUILD UP THE LARGEST REAL ESTATE BUSINESS IN THE WORLD IN LESS THAN SEVEN YEARS

IT DOESN'T matter whether you want to buy or whether you want to sell any kind of real estate or business in any section of the country, I can give you the kind of service that means to you a great saving of time, trouble and money. Generally speaking, my success is proof of my ability—but I want to give you proof of my ability to sell your property, if you want to sell, or to promptly fill your requirements if you want to buy. If you think there is any reason why I am not able to do just what I say I can do, I want you to write and tell me exactly what you think. I want to be perfectly frank with you in regard to every detail of my business, but I can't be unless you are perfectly frank with me. If I find, upon investigation, that there is some special reason why I cannot handle your property satisfactorily, I will tell you so; or if I find that the kind of property you want to buy cannot be obtained for the price you want to pay, I will promptly tell you that. I believe in giving the best possible service in the shortest possible time. This is the secret of my success. Will you let me serve you? If you want to sell, fill out the left-hand blank on this page and mail it to me to-day. I will then tell you exactly what I can do for you, and how and why I can do it. If you want to buy, fill out and mail to me the right-hand blank. I will then send you a list of properties which I think will fill your requirements.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Subscriber, Pella, Iowa. How long did the ten plagues last in Egypt?

There is no record to show how long they lasted, but in all probability it was a comparatively short time—not many weeks, or a few months, at longest.

Subscriber, Somerville, Mass. Will you kindly inform me of the names of the places where Paul stopped on his three missionary journeys, and the voyage. Also the places in the Bible where I can find all these points.

You will find all the points indicated in one of the maps bound up with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Teacher's Bible. For fuller description see McClintock and Strong's Biblical Encyclopedia.

E. C. S., Belle Vernon. Who is now Secretary of National Union of Christian Endeavor?

Mr. Von Ogden Vogt, an American, of Swiss descent, a Western man, Presbyterian, College graduate, and an ardent and experienced Endeavorer.

Flora, Augusta, Me. How long has the cut-flower industry been pursued in the United States?

"Fifty years ago," writes an excellent authority, "it would not have been possible to purchase cut-flowers during the winter season in any of the large cities of this country. Millions of dollars are now invested in the cultivation and sale of cut-flowers; by census estimate they make more than one-half of the florist's business. The growth and evolution of the business has been very rapid in the past twenty-five years." Many can remember when the camelia was the chief cut-flower for personal adornment, and when blossoms on wires, in set bouquets, was love or friendship's offering, superseded long since by long-stemmed roses, loosely arranged.

A. Y., Scotsburn, Can. Does the deviation of the magnetic needle from the geographical north vary according to longitude? If so, what is its present variation at 63° west of Greenwich?

We have submitted this question to The Scientific American, New York, which answers as follows: "The variation of the magnetic needle is not according to longitude at all. We have no map showing the magnetic variation for the part of Canada from which the inquiry comes. Maps published by the United States Government do not cover the region. It is probable the variation is about 22°-23°. The correspondent should apply to the Canadian Geological Department, at Ottawa, Canada, for the data."

S. B. DeG., Bradford, Pa., writes:

Referring to the question of a correspondent in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of March 25th, I would say that Mt. Ararat was ascended October 9th, 1829, by Dr. Frederich Parrcat with five companions, to the highest point. The thermometer registering only six and two-thirds degree Fahr. below freezing at three p. m., though the summit is covered with perpetual ice—a good preservation for the ark. He found the mountain to be 17,210 feet high.

Mrs. E. J., Ogden, Utah. Please publish the complete stanza in which the following verses occur—we have all but the last line.

"God is great and God is good,
Let us thank him for this food,
From his hands all blessings flow—

The little tenement waifs who are each summer our fresh air guests at Mont Lawn (our readers aiding us in giving them outings), sing as a grace before meals, the following:

God is great and God is good,
And we thank him for this food,
By his grace must all be fed,
Give us, Lord, our daily bread. Amen.

G. A., St. Cloud, Minn. How was it possible for a work of the supposed dimensions of the Tower of Babel to be erected in the time, and by the few people who lived directly after the Flood? It appears to me, after careful calculations, that not over 2,000 people, men and women and children, composed the population at the confusion of languages. This is based on the given population of the "ark," and their greatest possible profication.

It is clear, from the Biblical account, that in the considerable period which must have elapsed between the Flood and the confusion, the race had multiplied rapidly and spread out over the land (see Gen. 10). Josephus, the Jewish historian (in Antiquities, Book 1, chap. 4), says that they were "a multitude" when they followed Nimrod's advice to build the tower. He adds "by reason of the multitude of hands employed on it, it grew very high sooner than any one could expect." All the evidence points to the conclusion that the period intervening was much greater than is indicated in Ussher's chronological notes found in the margin of the Bible. Those calculations are not in any sense a portion of the text itself, but were made about the year 1650.

Martin, Newport, R. I. Why is typhoid fever found, according to population, more frequently in the country than in the city? In rural mountainous districts, where one has every reason to expect health, this disease often overtakes the visitor from town or attacks him soon after he returns to the city.

Because, as medical authorities state, sanitary conditions in regard to water supply are not so well understood or enforced in the country as in the city, where a Board of Health (usually composed, in part at least, of physicians and other scientific men), looks after such matters. A family in rural districts is often found drinking water from a well in close proximity to, and possibly below, the level of a graveyard, or other contaminating source, and in direct line of drainage therefrom. The fact that water may look perfectly pure is no evidence that it is so; nor is the fact that one person does not succumb to poisonous effects, proof that another, more susceptible, may not. Every one should study the question of pure water supply, filtration, sewage and drainage. The use of plain common sense in digging wells in the right place, of guarding the drink of milch cows from pollution, of washing vegetables in clean fluid, goes a long way in elevating the health standard of farmsteads and villages.

American, Walla Walla, Wash. Is the rate of increase in American population greater or less than formerly? 2. Are more children employed at money-making?

A decline in the rate has been recorded for each decade since 1860. The percentage of increase for each decade since 1790 is: 1800, 35.1; 1810, 36.4; 1820, 33.1; 1830, 33.5; 1840, 32.7; 1850, 35.9; 1860, 35.6; 1870, 26.6; 1880, 26; 1890, 24.9; 1900, 20.7. The "desire to accumulate wealth" has been cited as one retarding influence. 2. The percentage of persons ten years of age or over engaged in "gainful occupations" has increased. In 1880 it was 47.1; in 1890, 48; 1900, 50.3; also, more females are at work.

Mrs. D. B. S., Seaville, N. J. Am I mistaken in my information, that you have given no notice nor protest against the unlawful and shameful "convening of Congress" on Sunday (the House, to do business), when signatures on that day are unlawful and are "null and void," thereby setting an example to this and other lands, which is, and will be pernicious in its effects on the people of all nations?

You have been misinformed. If you will read the article on the subject on the editorial page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, issue of February 25 of this year, you will there find what is probably the first comment on the subject by any religious publication. Congress violated the Sabbath on February 8, by transacting current business in the Lower House, and it rescinded its action on February 9, when an outspoken member denounced the Sunday work as immoral, reprehensible and illegal.

J. B., Cottage Grove, Wis. What particular property or virtue is in the number "seven," that it should be used in the Old and New Testaments in preference to any other number, from Genesis to Revelation.

One explanation is that is a symbolical number, composed of elements of which three are divinity and four humanity, the whole typifying the union between God and man. Another is that it has reference to external things, and many ancient nations so regarded it. Cicero called seven "the knot and cement of all things," natural and spiritual. It was anciently used as a cyclical and astronomical number, and as typical of perfection. The Hebrews probably received their notion of its sanctity from other and older nations, and gradually adopted it in connection with the appointment of all religious periods.

New Subscriber, Belmont, O. How may a person know when he is really converted? Does not the commission of sin prove that conversion has not taken place?

That is not a reliable test. Unhappily, even converted men fall into sin at times. There is, however, this difference, that before conversion sin occasions little if any sorrow, after conversion it is sincerely mourned and deplored and God's help is sought not only for pardon, but for strength to avoid it in the future. There are many signs of conversion. One is that just stated in the soul's attitude toward sin. Another is love for Christ, through whom all blessings come. There is, too, an intense desire in know him and be like him and a complete dependence on him, and a resolve that if his will is recognized it shall be obeyed at any cost. There is also a change of feeling toward others, especially toward all who also love Christ. The soul that has been born again is full of love to men and women and there is a desire to render them service. These are among the most conspicuous signs of conversion, but they are not always all present at the beginning of the Christian life, but develop later.

J. R. E., Belleville, Pa. In your recent article on "Temperance," by Hervey Wood, he reports in Pennsylvania 600 cities and towns, and 20 counties having local option. We are living in a small town cursed with license. The majority in the town and township oppose it, but our judge grants the license all the same. Having the good of the community at heart, how can I proceed, or what can I do to help bring about the condition enjoyed by the no-license towns?

Write to editor of The People, published in Philadelphia, who will advise you.

James D. L., Metuchen, N. J. 1. What does the Finnish word "Suomi" mean? 2. Where did the Finns come from originally—Europe or Asia?

1. It is an ancient name used to denote a branch of the Finnish race and now transferred to the country itself. 2. Philologists state that they belonged to the Finnish-Ugrian, whose descendants are now to be found along the rivers Ob and Ural and the Danube, and that they are therefore related to the Magyars. In the early Christian era they were called Fens or Finns by the neighboring races—probably meaning the people who lived in the fens or marshes.

R. T., Fordyke, Miss. Did Christ know that Judas was a thief when he appointed him to the apostleship? If so, was it done to ensure the fulfilment of prophecy?

It is probable that Judas was not a thief when he was chosen by Christ to be an apostle. Every man has in him the germ of his worst act, but in the case of Judas, it may not have been at that time developed to the extent that it was afterwards. We cannot conceive of Jesus deliberately choosing a dishonest man to be his disciple. He may have hoped that, like other men who are capable of good or evil, the good might triumph under his own influence. The fact of Judas committing suicide when he saw that Christ was about to die, is an indication of there being good in the man. One altogether given over to evil would not have felt such remorse. He would have been indifferent.

THE NEW FLAGLER CHURCH, MIAMI, FLA., A PRETTY TEMPLE IN THE LAND OF FLOWERS

During the winter just past, Florida has been, more than ever, the Mecca of tourists, health-seekers and wealthy pleasure-seekers from all over the world. The changes noted by those who have been annual visitors, for a long time back, are interesting; palatial hotels, springing up by sunny beaches; picturesque riverside little villages, blossoming through prosperity, into new charm, like the flowers; and, best of all, fair temples of worship arising here and there, to replace buildings less attractive and commodious, are among those mentioned. One friend of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sends this picture of the pretty church in Miami, given, about two years ago, by Mr. Henry M. Flagler. It is under the direction of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, and stands where the lowly Mission House used to be. The attractive manse is also Mr. Flagler's gift. "It is thought," says our correspondent, "that Mr. Flagler will endow the church, unless he is anticipated by some wealthy winter visitor, who may do this, as a thank-offering for health restored." Miami has only 1,600 residents; but in winter it entertains many guests from a distance, who swell the congregration of the pretty church.

A NATIVE CARRIER

A JOURNEY AMONG SAVAGE TRIBES

By EMILIO OLSSON, Missionary in South America

THE Indian tribe of the Chiquitanos, is located about 2,000 miles inland from Buenos Ayres. During my long ride of ninety-two days on mule-back, through the great Indian forest of the Bolivian Chaco, on my ay towards the River Amazon, I me across this tribe, which I consid- a remarkable race. Originally the hiquitanos came from Peru, many enturies ago. They are descendants f the ancient Incas of prehistoric mes. The Chiquitanos are pacific, d plant corn, rice, mandioca, ba- anas, coffee and sugar, for exporta- on to the rubber district. The cli- ate on the mountains in the prov- ce is very healthy for foreigners, and favorable for European emigration. his part of Bolivia is the most im- ortant in South America, and mil- ons of people could find work here. he land and forest afford opportu- ities for development.

To this simple people I preached he Gospel of Jesus, through an in- erpreter, throughout a territory of bout 1,000 miles. I doubt not that it as the first time they had heard the ondrous story of a Saviour's love, d their interest was intense. When told them "The Bible was the Word f God," such was their reverence at some of them wanted to kiss the ook.

One chief embraced me at parting, d asked me to remain among his eople.

South America's wild tribes are ripe r the Gospel, and many are eager to ceive the missionary as teacher and friend. But who will o? Where are the workers to be sent to these tribes, now st in spiritual darkness?

At Bella Villa, in the very heart of the continent, I held a meeting, where about one hundred souls, for the first time in their lives, prayed most earnestly to the living God.

During our journey we had to travel through forests and pampas, frequented by wild beasts and human savages.

CAMPING ON THE BOLIVIAN CHACO

In fact, most of the eastern and northern parts of Bolivia are inhabited by savage tribes, making the road dangerous to travelers. Several settlements which we passed had been lately attacked by Indians and a number of the people killed with machetes. At one time a savage tribe was round about our camp all night, making noise. I slept soundly that night, being very tired after a hard day's ride. In the morning the Indians had gone, but their foot-prints were seen near by.

One morning, near our camp, a tiger was seen by one of our peons, who fired a gun at him, frightening him off. At another time a large snake brushed up against the mule I rode, but did no harm beyond scaring us. In the treacherous swamps of Mojos, my mule sank twice in the mud, and we were extricated with difficulty. These swampy plains are completely under water in the rainy season, and at times the people travel about in boats or canoes. At Savario, our mules had to swim across a river which was infested by caimans. We shot one of these creatures, about two metros long. Besides crocodiles, there are in this region many annoying small insects and mosquitoes, which sting one painfully. One day my black guide and I lost our way in the forest. We were without water and food, and in the darkness it was the most terrible night I ever spent. We were repeatedly bitten by great ants, about an inch long and venomous. We both jumped about and screamed like wild men. We hurried away from that place, and struggled on through the forest to save our lives.

At another time, while "shooting" the perilous rapids above Madeira Falls, we nearly perished. One boat that came after us was capsized in the awful cataract, and five men lost their lives. The deadly tropical fevers, too, were very dangerous. I had a touch of the fever twice. I do praise God for saving my life in that

HE IS RISEN!

AN EASTER SERMON BY REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

TEXT—I. Corinthians 15: 14: "And if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain"

Cut branches and spread them in the way — "Now Jesus stood before the Governor" — Joseph claims the body of Jesus — An angel came and rolled away the stone

THE following are imaginary extracts from a daily newspaper supposed to be printed in Jerusalem during the lifetime of Jesus Christ.

1. "We have called the attention of our readers several times to the fact that the person known as Jesus Christ, is either the greatest Being that ever trod this earth, or he is the greatest impostor that ever lived. The raising of the dead man Lazarus at Bethany, a few days ago, is said by those who were present to be the most remarkable scene they ever witnessed. Several members of the Sanhedrin were present on that occasion, and they do not deny that a man who had been actually dead four days walked out of his tomb, when Jesus Christ said in a loud voice, 'Lazarus, come forth.' Still, they think it is best to be cautious in the matter of believing too much. They mean to watch Christ even more closely than before, and, if possible, discover the secret or trick by which he seems to perform these miracles. We also shall watch the history of this wonderful Person with the greatest interest, and from time to time give our readers the most trustworthy items of information concerning his public career.

2. "Yesterday was a remarkable day in Jerusalem. The Nazarene came into the city surrounded by a multitude of eager, shouting, enthusiastic men, women and children. They saluted him by the title of King, and he listened to it in silence. Those nearest him in the great crowd, say that they saw tears in his eyes and his face took on a sad expression, such as no man ever saw on human face before. It is said that the 'Master,' as he is called, has of late been making some mysterious allusions to his own approaching death. It is reported that he has declared that after his death he will rise again after three days. Such language, even on the part of one who seems to have such power, must be taken with a good degree of caution.

"But the most surprising fact about the demonstration of yesterday, is the manner in which the whole affair ended. The Chief Priests and Scribes and Pharisees fully expected that Christ would assume entire authority in the city, take the title of King, so freely given him by the people, and by a series of miracles begin his reign by driving out the Roman garrison. But to the astonishment of every one, his immediate friends included, who had, it is whispered, the same expectations, at the close of the day Christ walked quietly out of the city and spent the night with his friends in Bethany. It is impossible to understand his motive in letting slip such a chance to place himself at the head of a powerful force. We are more and more inclined to believe the High Priests and Scribes are right, and that time will show Jesus to be a great deceiver of the common people.

3. "Another remarkable scene in Jerusalem must be added to all the rest which has been so strange in connection with Jesus Christ. Last night he was arrested, while in a small garden just outside the city walls, and this morning taken before Pilate, the Roman Governor, on a charge of insurrection. It is the old charge. He has often called himself,and allowed others to call him, the 'King of the Jews.' And no man can do that safely as long as Augustus Cæsar is Emperor of the world. Pilate was very much puzzled to know what to do in the matter, but finally consented to the death sentence. Christ will be crucified this morning, unless he uses the wonderful power which he is said to possess to escape from his enemies. To our minds, it seems highly probable, that this will be the last that will be heard of this Person. His friends are very few, in comparison with his foes, and they are from the lowest laboring forces. It is reported that when their Leader was arrested, they all forsook him and fled.

4. "The crucifixion has taken place, and the remarkable person known as Jesus of Nazareth is no more. He was executed with two robbers upon the elevation called Golgotha, northwest of the city. He met his death with the calmness and patience which have always been characteristic of him, and even conversed with one of the robbers who hung beside him. His death occurred much earlier than any one had expected, in such a young person (he was only thirty-three years old), and it is conjectured that one of the blood vessels of the heart may have burst owing to the intense agony of suffering he endured.

"There were some remarkable features connected with this crucifixion, which we cannot pass over in silence. A few hours before Christ's death, a darkness began to fall upon the earth, and this grew deeper and deeper until he finally died; while at the very moment of his death a distinct earthquake was felt all about the hill Golgotha, and even in the city itself. We mention these facts, because it seems a curious coincidence that the death of this Person should be marked by these manifestations of nature, since he has so often apparently exercised his power over the natural elements.

"As soon as it was ascertained that Jesus was actually dead, Joseph of Arimathea, who is well known in Jerusalem, went to Pilate and asked permission to take the body down and place it in a new tomb near the place of execution. Pilate granted his request, and the body was removed by Christ's friends. Thus a strange life is finally ended. The failure of Jesus to assert his power over death proves, almost beyond a doubt, that his pretensions were unwarranted, and throws considerable suspicion upon his supposed miraculous ability.

5. "To-day the Chief Priests and Pharisees went in a body to Pilate, and asked that a guard of soldiers be appointed to watch the sepulchre where Jesus is lying, for fear his disciples may come by night and remove him, and then claim that he rose from the dead of his own accord. It will be remembered by our readers that before his crucifixion, Jesus uttered some such words as these: 'After three days I shall rise again.' The entire notion of such a thing is too absurd to claim any reasoning person's attention. Pilate, however, authorized the watch, and it is now stationed at the tomb, making it impossible for his disciples to steal the body away. But they do not seem to have any such intention. They are said to be thoroughly disheartened by the crucifixion of their leader, and quietly hiding for fear of meeting the same fate.

6. "There is a rumor going about the city that in spite of the guard stationed at the sepulchre where Jesus was placed, his friends managed to enter and remove his body. It is entirely certain that his body is not there this morning. Reliable witnesses who have been to the tomb state that it is empty. The excuse given by the guard is that they fell asleep. If that is so, their carelessness deserves the severest punishment. Of course, the disciples of Jesus will make new capital out of this. They will pretend that their Master rose himself from the dead, as he said he would do. There is little probability, however, that this fiction will meet with success. As we have said before, Christ's followers are comparatively few, and almost without exception from the lowest classes. A few persons whom he is said to have healed of diseases may continue to have respect and affection for him, but the large majority of people in Jerusalem and the surrounding country, will soon forget that such a person as Jesus Christ ever lived. His name will survive one or two generations possibly, and then sink into oblivion along with his obscure disciples, fishermen and peasants of Galilee. The Jewish nation need have little fear that Christ will have any power from this time forth.

He is dead, and this recent ruse of his disciples in stealing away his body will not advance their cause. Rather it will be the death-blow to it. No good cause truly flourishes when built upon deceit. This is the last we expect to hear of Jesus Christ, or of his doctrines."

IF there had been a daily newspaper in Jerusalem two thousand years ago, it would probably have contained just such opinions. To all human foresight the career of Jesus Christ was over; and, worst of all, his disciples had committed the gravest mistake of all, in stealing his body from its resting place. With what emotion, then, do we, on this Easter morning, so far removed from the first one, hear these words of a man whose mental equal for calmness of judgment and penetration of intellect, it would be hard to find in the world to-day. "And if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain." Ah! Paul understood well enough the basis of true preaching. It was a living Christ, not a dead one who could make others live also. It was a risen Saviour, not one yet held captive by the last enemy, who could inspire men's hearts, and fire their speech and touch their souls. Turning now from the facts of the Resurrection, but keeping the great fact itself in mind, let us consider briefly:

1st.—The object of preaching, and,

2d.—The motive power of preaching.

These two points will necessarily be closely related. I ask you to follow me earnestly in a simple analysis of each point in turn. 1st.—The object of preaching.

To put it very plainly, what am I preaching to you for every week? I know you will not say it is simply for the salary, because I might earn that in a great many other ways far easier than by preaching. It is not simply to amuse, or interest, or even instruct you, for I might do all that without entering a pulpit; by simply editing a newspaper, or writing a book, or going upon a lecture platform. It is not solely for the purpose of telling you to do what is right, to live lovingly together, to be good citizens of this town, that I preach to you. Anybody can do that. Nothing is easier than preaching to people about what they ought to do. Neither is the object of preaching to get men to join this church as the end of all my effort. That might be a very small or even selfishly personal motive. What, then, is the object of preaching on my part? It is very easily answered, but after it is answered, that is not by any means the end of the matter; it is only the beginning.

The object of my preaching, and of all true preaching, is to present a living Christ to men; it is to reach men's souls rather than their intellects. I sometimes think a man's intellect is the only thing that gets between him and Christ, and then I feel like exclaiming for myself, "Teach me, O God, to aim more at the heart and less at the head. At any rate, help me to win men; not simply their dry, intellectual assent to old truths that they know as well as I do, but a warm, honest, manly assent of the man himself to a living faith." That is the object of preaching. It is not to read so many moral tracts a year from the pulpit; it is not simply to give eloquent and pleasing descriptions of scenery in Palestine, it is not to amuse and entertain for a self-satisfied audience; but it is to get hold of men, with something that can stir them in the deepest part of their natures. It is to do something more than tickle their fancy for something pleasant; it is to make the reality of life more real, and man's eternal relation to him more vivid. It is to thrust the glowing, blazing intensity of one's whole Christian personality in among the cold, indifferent, torpid, self-satisfied souls of men, and set them ablaze with the thought of Christ's love for them. This is my object in preaching. Show me a higher, better object and I will try to make it mine. There is no higher object, no better object. But all that would fl[at]ly to the ground, the preaching would be in vain[.] Christ were not risen from the dead. You cannot lig[ht] one dead coal by putting another dead coal beside i[t]; neither can you warm men's hearts, or ignite their so[ul]s by preaching a dead Christ to them.

Heaven pardon us who stand too often in weakn[ess] and imperfect utterance to proclaim the loving God [to] sinful men! How often we throw down before t[hem] hungry soul husks instead of grain! What a mocke[ry] it seems sometimes to deal in rhetoric, or childish o[ra]tory, or youthful declamation, when Christ is waiting [to] be presented. How empty is the preaching when t[he] living Christ is absent, and useless discussion over ma[ny] articles of belief, or foolish argument over disput[ed] points of doctrine take the place of a living faith, spea[k]ing to men in entreaty, invitation, almost comma[nd] urging them to choose between life and death! Som[e] of you may think that the preacher is doing all he oug[ht] to do in preaching a good, moral life, in mildly reco[m]mending religion as an antidote to vice, in softly exc[o]ing sin as an unavoidable disease. But, unless preachi[ng] has something in view more serious and earnest a[nd] vital than the timid suggestions of such timid moralis[ts], then Paul must have been tremendously mistaken in h[is] ideas of preaching. Paul said that the preaching w[as] vain if Christ was not risen. This makes the presen[ta]tion of the living Christ to men the great object [of] preaching. Other objects may be included in this: [in]struction, warning, rebuke, encouragement, consolati[on], advice, even all these may be in the preaching, but do[wn] at the bottom of all else is the one great object — [to] bring men to Christ, and thus to a Christ-like life. [As] soon as the pulpit begins to let go of this one end [of] preaching, it is losing its hold, it is bound, sooner, ater, to feel its weakness, and despair of its influence. f the time ever comes when I feel that the object in reaching is anything less or lower than to reach men s they can be reached only through the love of Christ, ay that moment be the last moment of my ministry. Without the risen, living Saviour, preaching will be othing but words. Smoke without any heat; and oise without any result.

And 2d.—The motive power of preaching. The ob-ect of preaching is to reach men through the risen hrist in the soul of the preacher. The one has to do ith those who hear; the other has to do with him who peaks.

The preacher's best subject is Christ. There is some-ing definite, satisfying, and universal in such a sub-ct. The preacher might talk five thousand years bout the usefulness of an honest life in society without eaching more than the outside of men's moral tissue. He might discuss in the most beautiful language the ifferent philosophical schemes of the world, without ver reaching a soul and making it quiver under his ouch. He might pile up mountain high his arguments rom probability as to the continued future existence of he person, and end it all with a "perhaps," and still men ould go away unfed. He might point out to men the nevitable consequences of wrong-doing, and the harden-ng fixity of character, and men would still listen, cold, ndifferent, or unresponsive. He might appeal to reason y every art known to the scholar or the orator, and still ail to win men themselves. He might attempt to tell men f God, and they would turn on him in moments of sorrow r despair, and demand of him the proof of such a state-ment. He might even do what has been done, preach to men of a Christ who never rose from the dead, who was simply a great and good man, and men would say, "What is the use of it all? What do we care for a dead Christ? Oh, no, no, no! Give us a living Christ or none! Preach to us a living Saviour, or else be silent altogether!" And, thanks be to God, we can preach a living, risen Christ! There is something here which goes deeper than utility, farther than argument, farther than cold reason; something warmer than philosophy, and more consoling than probability. What you and I want is not more theories respecting the creation of man, but more light concerning the Creator of man; and Christ brought that light into the world, for he was the true light "which lighteth every man coming into the world." What you and I want, is not so much an answer to the question: "Why does God permit evil?" But, "how is evil going to be pushed out of my own life?" And Christ has answered that question by pointing men to himself, the sinless One. What you and I want is not simply the hope of a possible immortality, so much as the absolute certainty of it; and that is assured for us again in Christ who triumphed over death on purpose to prove immortality.

He rose, the Christ we love, to live forevermore;
He passed from earth triumphant to the skies;
The fast shut tomb became an open door,
Thro' which He entered into blissful Paradise.

Death lost its universal terror then; and now
No demon sits on graves of mortal clay,
But angels wait, with radiant face and brow,
To roll the heavy stone which seals the tomb, away.

It is not without its significance that the angel not only rolled away the stone, but also sat upon it, in governing majesty, as if to prevent all Hell's power to roll it back again.

Will you listen to the Christ this day? He has spoken to you in many ways already, more tender and appealingly than I can ever speak. Will you not go home this day with some deeper resolve than you have yet ever made, to be more worthy of God's love to the race? Will you close either your mind or heart to all those better influences which will come in to make your life sweeter, more peaceful, and happy, if you will only encourage them to enter? Will you not go to your homes and in the quiet of the Sabbath day, in the calm confronting of yourself with yourself, choose the best thing a human being can choose, a life of Christian service in the Kingdom which is going to be the universal Kingdom of Love and eternal Happiness? And shall we all bear away with us the hopeful spirit which breathes about this commemoration of the resurrection of the Saviour of men?

I know my Lord is risen; for I feel
The gentle touch of that once pierced palm,
Which has not lost its earthly power to heal,
Which soothes my fever into heavenly calm.

I know my Lord is risen; for I see
Those blessed feet, once pierced by nails of pain,
Hasten with steps of mercy unto me.
That mercy which can make my loss my gain.

I know my Lord is risen; for I find
The heart that beat within that bleeding side,
Is beating still for me, and all mankind,
And so, I know He lives, tho' once He died.

GIDEONS WITH PITCHER AND TORCH

THEY INVADE NEW YORK, ORGANIZE A CAMP, AND MAKE MANY FRIENDS IN THE METROPOLIS

THAT wonderfully energetic organization of Christian commercial travelers, the Gideons, which in a remarkably short time has expanded to national proportions, has invaded New York. On Saturday and Sunday, March 28 and 29, seven of the leading evangelistic and progressive churches of the metropolis, together with the Y. M. C. A., opened wide the gates, and gave a cordial welcome to the traveling men's organization. These churches were the Judson Memorial, the West End Presbyterian, the Calvary Baptist, the Metropolitan Temple, the Marble Collegiate, the Broadway Tabernacle, and the Westminster Presbyterian, while the Y. M. C. A. centre was the very prominent West Side Branch on Fifty-seventh street.

This simple organization of commercial travelers for Christian fellowship and service, is not yet four years old. All are members of some church, and their short creed is that they believe in Jesus Christ as their only Saviour. They wear the button with the white pitcher and torch of flame, that they may recognize each other. CHRISTIAN HERALD readers are already familiar with the history of the rise and growth of the movement. From the first humble meeting in Janesville, Wis., July 1, 1899, with only three men present, the Gideons have grown to over three thousand members, with eleven state camps and more than sixty local camps. The most prominent and active camp is that in Chicago, of about three hundred members. Several of the national officers, including Mr. Frank A. Garlick, National President, and Mr. Charles H. Palmer, National Superintendent, and many forceful and trained workers, are members of this camp. It has had the joy of seeing over three hundred souls confess Christ in its various meetings, held at the invitation of pastors in churches, and its Willard Hall noonday services, during less than two years of active history. In Wisconsin, where the movement started, the Gideons already have to their credit the fact that seventy-one hotels in the smaller towns have thrown out their bar, in response to the frank and manly protest of these wearers of the button,—a fruit of the work which will yet be witnessed all over the land.

Having no salaried officers to go out into the field as organizers, the Gideons volunteer, each paying his own expenses or having them made up within the brotherhood. The movement has spread slowly eastward, embracing now the States of Indiana and Michigan. The opportunity to organize in New York came in the removal of the Rev. Charles H. Morgan, Ph.D., a member of the organization, from Chicago to New York, early in the present year. In his work of authorship in the Bible study course used by the United Society of Christian Endeavor and Epworth League, Dr. Morgan went to Chicago in October, 1902, where he came into intimate relations with the aggressive work of the camp. He had already had the privilege of Gideon membership accorded him, though a clergyman, because of his frequent trips into various States to speak at young people's conventions, taking with him samples of the Bible study text-books for the convenience of those desiring them.

Soon after coming to New York, Dr. Morgan was requested by President Garlick of the Gideons to prepare the way for Gideon organization there, and through his interviews and conferences with pastors and church workers, the plans were arranged which have now been so successfully carried out.

Mr. Charles H. Palmer, whose business takes him from Chicago to the Pacific, and who is the National Field Superintendent of the Gideons, and one of its ablest leaders, came at his own expense from Chicago to New York to assist in forming the new camp. Hon. John V. Farwell, an enthusiastic friend of the movement, as he has been of every similar Christian cause for forty years, came from Atlantic City, where he is spending a few weeks for the benefit of Mrs. Farwell's health, that he might join in the work.

GIDEON ORGANIZERS AND OFFICERS OF THE NEW YORK CAMP

1. Hon. John V. Farwell, of Chicago. 2. Mr. F. B. Burt, Vice-President New York Camp. 3. Mr. C. Maclean Smith, President New York Camp. 4. Mr. Shepherd Harris, Secretary and Treasurer. 5. Dr. Charles H. Morgan, Chaplain New York Camp. 6. Mr. Charles H. Palmer, of Chicago, National Superintendent.

The organizing meeting took place in the rooms of the Men's Club of the Judson Memorial, March 28, at 8 o'clock. Dr. C. H. Morgan presiding. Rev. David A. MacMurray, President of the Club, gave words of welcome. Rev. G. A. Gordon, Dr. Howard Agnew Johnston, Mr. Farwell, and Mr. Palmer made brief addresses. A resolution was presented by Dr. John Lloyd Lee, and unanimously adopted, expressing the joy of the pastors and Christian workers in the growth of the Gideon movement, welcoming its entrance into the religious activities of Greater New York, and giving assurance of Christian co-operation with the Gideons in their soul-winning work. Mr. C. Maclean Smith was chosen President, Mr. F. B. Burt, Vice-President; Mr. Shepherd Harris, Secretary and Treasurer, and Dr. Morgan, Chaplain. Mr. John S. Huyler, Mr. D. Benedict and Mr. J. C. Andress are among the well-known men who take an active interest in the movement, the first named having been admitted to membership.

Very marked interest attended each of the various meetings during Sunday, March 29, in the churches already mentioned, at each of which the principles and spirit of the Gideon organization were fully and clearly presented. Mr. Farwell, Rev. Robert Bagnell, Mr. Palmer and Rev. Mr. Morgan were among the speakers. The closing and crowning event of the day took place at the Westminster Presbyterian Church, where the pastor, Rev. John Lloyd Lee, and his people enjoyed a typical Gideon meeting such as is regularly held on invitation in many of the churches in Chicago.

National Field Superintendent Charles H. Palmer, in less than four days spent in New York, spoke twelve times, ranging from the Water street and Chinatown missions to the cultured congregations of the uptown churches, and every address seemed exactly fitted to the occasion. Over one hundred of his hearers gave expression of a desire for the Christian life. The cordial reception and sincere fellowship given to the work and the workers in all the churches, will be remembered as a most pleasing feature of the founding of the Gideon movement in Greater New York.

HOW A FLOWER GREW INTO A SETTLEMENT

EAST of the Bowery, in New York, is a district, which, for density of population, variety of nationality, misery and squalor, has few, if any, equals in the world. It may be doubted whether even Cologne, in which city a visitor declared that he counted five hundred distinct and clearly defined stenches, is richer in this bad product than this section of the American metropolis, when, after a drizzling rain, the spring sun sends its heat into the gutters. Push carts line the curb in many of the streets, and dirty pedlers stand there and bargain with untidy, dirty women, over the vegetables and fruit and other wares that they have for sale. Seldom is a word of English heard, and in the excitement that is caused by a dispute over a cent, it is difficult to tell whether the disputants are talking Yiddish, or some dialect of the Balkan provinces. Men, gloomy and morose, stand at the corners of the streets, with the out-of-work look on their faces, and the suggestion in their manner and gait of acquaintance with the stuff that, under various aliases, is sold in the saloons. On the stoops are women, wan and spiritless, talking sadly to one another, and keeping an eye on their children, playing on the sidewalk. There are enough of these little ones to show that President Roosevelt's indictment against small families does not apply to this section. Bright children they are, and one would imagine that many of them were pretty, too, if one could see them without the veil of dirt that hides their features. This district presents, in sad and distressing shape, the types of "The Other Half" about which Jacob Riis has written so eloquently and sympathetically.

Prosperous Christians passing through the district might well be thankful to God that their lot was cast in a neighborhood more healthful, physically and morally. Probably the Priest and the Levite, who passed the man lying robbed and half dead on the road between Jerusalem and Jericho were similarly thankful to Providence at having escaped his misfortune. Happily for these people, the spirit of the good Samaritan was in the hearts of some also who went through those streets. Mr. Jacob Riis, the friend and helper of the poor, knew where to find such good Samaritans, and some fifteen years ago he called their attention to the conditions of the East Side. He had seen a point in the character of these people which indicated an avenue by which they could be approached. This was their innate love of natural beauty, which not even the grime of their lives could eradicate. Going through the district from his country home, to his work on the New York Sun, he had generally a flower in his button-hole, for which the children on the sidewalk eagerly clamored. It gave the proud possessor so much pleasure, that Mr. Riis began to bring with him every morning a bunch of flowers, so as to multiply the recipients and extend the pleasure. This was the clue to acquaintance, which he put into the hands of his Samaritan friends. Such a clue is necessary, for the problem of giving the right kind of help to the American poor is more complex than that of helping the Judean victim of the robbers. Their need is not so obvious, though it may be quite as real, and they are not so willing to incur obligations.

Mr. Riis' hint was sufficient for a few ladies connected with the King's Daughters, to whom he first gave it. They obtained a regular supply of flowers, which they distributed in the basement of an old church in the district. As had been foreseen, the simple gifts led to acquaintance with the people, and a knowledge of their troubles and difficulties. The ladies did not foresee to what the acquaintance might lead, but with the spirit of Christ in their hearts, they could not hear of sorrow and suffering without making an effort to alleviate it. They were soon known to the people of the district, especially in the rooms of the sick, and their visits were heartily welcomed. They took with them flowers and delicacies, and occasionally articles of clothing or household need, the absence of which they noticed. There they met the physicians of the Board of Health, who visit the sick poor, and from them they heard of other homes in which their ministrations would do good. There was no preaching, no teaching, no officious interference, nothing but kindly sympathy and helpfulness. Before many months had passed, there were three hundred homes in which they were welcome visitors and were regarded as friends.

THE KINDERGARTEN CLASS

Many a sad story was told to sympathizing listeners, and these stories were made the subject of consultation by the kind-hearted Samaritans. How to help the sufferers best?—that was the problem. A clothing bureau and a collection of medical supplies were the two most obvious steps. Three rooms were taken in a house in Madison street, to which supplies could be sent. Gradually, as acquaintance ripened, other needs were disclosed. The mothers were concerned about their children, but did not know what to do for them. Their friends knew, and soon a kindergarten was begun. Then there was a sewing school for the older girls, and then the mothers, conscious of their own defects, put in their claim for help, and a Mothers' Club was organized. The loan of a few books, which were speedily worn out, suggested a Circulating Library. The slow convalescence of some poor sick women suggested a Fresh Air Fund. Thus the work has gradually broadened, until now there are thirty-nine distinct branches of helpfulness in operation. Among them are: the Kitchen Garden Class, in which girls are taught how to become systematic and economical housekeepers: the Vigilant Literary Club, composed of young men of different nationalities, including Jews, Italians, Greeks and Irish, who study together and conduct debates; the Home Makers' Club, in which women study household economy and learn how to cut and make children's garments; the Athletic Club, for young men who delight in physical exercise, and many other clubs and classes. These were organized in response to suggestions made by the people themselves or to meet needs observed by the workers. They are managed by the members, with such help and suggestion as they may desire. Another privilege profoundly appreciated is the use of the back-yard, which has been turned into a garden for the benefit of the young folks. The bigger ones cultivate plants, and at one side is a sand-pile, with which the little

FINLANDERS GIVE WELCOME IN SONG

2,000 SCHOOL CHILDREN OF ULEABORG GREET THE CHRISTIAN HERALD RELIEF PARTY WITH SONG AND FLOWERS

The photograph, taken specially for this journal, shows the scene in front of the Societetshuset, at Uleaborg, on Saturday, March 14. The Mayor and other officials of the city, and the Americans, are standing in the entrance. Dr. Klopsch is speaking. Crowds of Finlanders surround the children, who are massed in front of the building.

ULEABORG, March 14th, 1903.

The most northerly city in the world.

Just a few lines to tell you that I am very ired, but well, and very much satisfied with the rip.

For the past ten days, we have traveled in ledges over snow and ice, through tremendous ine forests, across lakes and rivers, frozen solid wenty inches in depth; far away from mail, elegraph and railroad facilities.

Wherever we stopped for the night, crowds athered under our windows, singing songs of welome, bringing flowers, and on our appearance, elling us, in a strange language, how sincerely hey appreciate the great goodness of the American people in the hour of Finland's direst eed. In every instance I replied through an nterpreter. Yesterday, two thousand school hildren and three thousand adults met in the quare in front of our hotel, for an ovation. They sang four songs and deluged us with lowers.

Thousands Living on Hunger-Bread

Wrapped in furs, we drove through wilderness after wilderness, crossing lakes, six, ten nd twelve miles in width. We stopped at armhouses and visited the people. We did not ome to them as strangers. The papers had rinted so much about the kind-hearted Amerians, and about ourselves, that every man, oman and child in Finland knows our names nd our mission.

The people are poor, very, very poor, and tens of thousands of them have not tasted anything but hunger-bread, made of chopped straw, ground pine-bark and rye flour, for over seven months—morning, noon and night the same thing, day after day, week after week, and month after month—and sometimes for days at a time not even that.

We have thus far given them $65,000, and but for this help from the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, one must shudder to think what their fate would have been. To-morrow night, after six hours by rail and twenty-five miles in sledges, we cross the Swedish frontier at Haparanda, where the Governor of Lulea has sent guides to meet us. Then, after visiting some famine points in Sweden, we travel eighty miles in sledges to the first railroad station.

Hardships of the Tour in a Land of Ice and Snow

It has been a very wearing trip—dreadfully so! Some nights our party of four—consisting of Dr. J. N. Reuter, appointed by the Helsingfors Central Relief Committee to accompany us; Mr. Robert Alopaeus, Overseer of the Government Industrial Homes; Mr. Gilson Willets and myself—slept in a single little room in some foul-smelling post-house, two in beds and two on the floor, the beds being chosen by lot. I have never had quite such an experience before; but, after all, these discomforts tend only to bring us into closer touch and more loving sympathy with the poor, pale-faced, sad-looking people we met at every house we visited.

If our readers could have made with us the trip to Saraisniemi, and witnessed the sights of destitution and suffering that met us there, and heard from colorless lips in a foreign tongue, God's choicest blessings invoked on the heads of the generous-hearted American people, they would surely have esteemed it an exalted privilege to have had an opportunity to bring a ray of sunshine into these disconsolate hearts and these cheerless and desolate homes.

As soon as we get through with our work, I shall tell the story of America's Relief operations in Finland in greater detail, and until then I beg the indulgence of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. LOUIS KLOPSCH.

Dr. Reuter's Story of the Journey

Concerning the journey of Dr. Klopsch, Mr. Willets, and Dr. Reuter, through the poverty-stricken regions in the far North, Dr. Reuter has communicated the following details, which are published in the Helsingfors Hufundstadsbladet of March 17:

From Kajana the travelers took a trip to the surrounding villages on March 7, visiting a great number of small farmhouses. Dr. Klopsch had in his company Rev. Vayrynen, the druggist Stenius, and the forrester Svanstrom. Another trip was made on the following Monday to Sotkamo, and this time the visitor had occasion to notice the dire distress prevailing all around. To the most needy families, Dr. Klopsch gave from five to twenty marks in every instance, and also procured bread to allay the pangs of hunger. He received the heartfelt thanks of the recipients of these gifts.

On Tuesday, the travelers started for Uleaborg. In Vuottolahti village (Kajana parish), they made a stop, and a peasant named Haataja conducted them to several poor homes, where ready assistance was given to the distressed. The journey was then continued to Vuolijoki village (Saraisniemi parish), where the party stopped at the Penttila farm. Next day the farm owner took his visitors to Saarimaki village, and here were found many persons who badly needed, and who were given relief. Dr. Klopsch left some money with

Tainted Money

A QUESTION has recently been occupying the attention of the secular press, which has in these days a more than usual pertinency. It is whether money can be tainted. That is to say, whether it is right for a clergyman, or a church, or a theological college to accept gifts of money from a man who has made it in dishonest or dishonorable ways. It is argued logically that there can be no taint on the money itself. That is obvious, as a child can see; but the question goes deeper than that. There can also be no dispute as to the moral side of a gift that is in the nature of a bargain. If the wrong-doer makes a gift, with the implied understanding that, in consideration of the gift, there shall be no denunciation of his evil deeds and evil methods, and if the gift is tacitly accepted on that basis, the money is a bribe and its taint smells to heaven. The receiver enters into complicity with the giver and his condemnation is just. A gift that closes the eyes and locks the lips disgraces the receiver.

It is with other gifts that conscience is concerned. When a man has done wrong, and has gained by that wrong a sum of money, and devotes a portion of it to religious or benevolent purposes, unconditionally, should his gift be accepted? Such gifts are prompted sometimes by a curious process of reasoning. Occasionally, the motive is the pagan one of bringing luck. With others, it is a sop to conscience, which is soothed by the reflection that the money is doing good, and that the giver, who knows he is debited with the wrong he has committed in getting the money, expects to be credited with his benevolence, and so to get the account balanced, at least in part. Or, it may be, that the giver is really penitent, and desires to make a species of restitution, not to the persons from whom it has been wrongfully taken, which might involve humiliation and confession; but in some way to get it out of his hands and into those of worthy persons or causes. It is with the offer of such gifts, that men who would keep their conscience void of offence, are in doubt.

We are told by the editor of an honorable and able journal, which has long been famous for its high principle and sound morality, that "We are to look not at the origin of the money, but to its power over ourselves. If it does not buy our truth and honor, it can only do good." But the origin of the money appears to us to be an aspect which ought not to be ignored. If we are not to regard its origin, there is nothing to prevent our accepting a part of the proceeds of a murder, or a burglary, or of arson. Such money no decent man would touch. How, then, can we escape the duty of considering the origin, when its taint is only one of degree? If we refuse to accept the proceeds of a crime, on what principle can we accept a gift from a man who has made his wealth by debauching other men, or by defrauding the widow and the orphan? The taint of wrong is upon the money, and the Church of Christ and the holy cause of charity ought to refuse to share in the proceeds of such wrong-doing.

Registered Drunkards

AFTER three months' experience of the new Licensing Act in Great Britain, the people have now an opportunity to judge as to the merits and efficacy of a system which is certainly the hardest blow ever dealt to the drink traffic in that country. Under the new law, the cities are divided into districts, and in each district the local magistrate has the power, if he rigidly enforces the law, to greatly diminish the too common evil of drunkenness within his jurisdiction, and to reduce the number of drinking places. In England, the saloon and not the saloonkeeper is licensed, and the aggregate of license revocations since the new law went into effect, has already been such as to gratify the temperance element and excite apprehension among the liquor men as to the future.

To illustrate the operation of the new law, it should be explained that persons who have been arrested and convicted of habitual drunkenness are registered, and "black lists," containing full and accurate descriptions of such offenders, are furnished to the police and the saloonkeepers in the district where the conviction took place. Under a previous law, it was difficult to convict a saloonkeeper of selling liquor to habitual drunkards; but now the fact of a "registered" drunkard having been seen coming out of a dramshop in an inebriated condition, is of itself conclusive evidence of guilt on the part of the saloonkeeper. Unless he is able to prove his innocence beyond all question, the license will be endangered, and the rum-seller will be subjected to the personal penalties provided in the statute. At each conviction, the premises are recorded as having a bad reputation; and three such entries on the record result in absolute forfeiture of the license. No new occupant can enter and conduct the place as a saloon. It is thereafter closed to the drink traffic permanently. Even though it should be the finest and most profitable barroom in the city, its business is gone the moment the license is annulled.

But the new law is equally drastic and uncompromising in its dealings with the drunkard. It can readily be understood that the saloonkeepers, knowing the peril of violation, try to keep well within the law by refusing to sell to doubtful cases. The same law makes it a punishable offense for any one to be found intoxicated in public. It is punishable for one who has been registered as a "habitual drunkard," to even try to procure liquor from any licensed place within three years after conviction. No saloonkeeper, grocer or druggist, knowing him as a registered man, will sell or give him drink and incur the penalty of a fine. He may, of course, procure it by going long distances; but the general effect of such a system as we have outlined is to deprive the drinker of his source of ready supply, and to keep him unavoidably sober.

Friends of temperance in our own land will watch the English experiment with deep and curious interest. Even if it should not accomplish all that could be desired, it is a reform in the right direction, since it makes for national sobriety.

About Saying the Wrong Thing

AMONG the minor humiliations of life, nothing surpasses the regret one feels at having said the wrong thing. A lady was taking a meal with an acquaintance whom she knew very slightly, and just before the dessert was brought on, she observed that she had an aversion to ginger-snaps—they seemed to her unfit for any decent table. In stepped the maid and set on the board a plate of spicy ginger-snaps, fresh and fragrant from the oven, the only cakes there were in the house. The unfortunate guest did not partake of the snaps, nor could she eat her words. "I learned," she said to me, "to be careful about expressing any dislikes, even the most innocent, in a strange house." When you do not know people very well, it is discreet to refrain from general observations which may reflect either on their past history, or their present condition. Embarrassing situations may result from an undue frankness, which had no excuse.

But this is a good and golden rule: When you do make a mistake, never deepen your own confusion by an apology. A giddy young woman suffered from a tendency to laugh immoderately in solemn places. The incongruity of some trifle would arouse her sense of the ludicrous, and life had not taught her self-control. One evening, something caused her to laugh in prayer-meeting, not at anything in the services, but at a foolish little incident that took place before her eyes, droll in itself, and therefore upsetting enough to a gay young girl. She restrained herself finally, and nobody would have been the worst or the wiser, if she had not, in an excess of penitence, gone and confessed her fault to the leader, a person with no sense of humor, who was exceedingly offended. When one does say or do the wrong thing, the better plan is to let it go, and as soon as possible forget all about it.

This advice refers solely to what socially are labelled "breaks." When one has by accident or on purpose done an injustice, the only right course is to make reparation by ample explanation and retraction. The cowardly spirit and temper are never to be tolerated, and are sternly to be repressed, if one discovers them as defects of character. The smaller, unintentional faux pas, which fill one with passing mortification, are to be left to the drifting of oblivion as soon as possible.

At five o'clock in the afternoon the travelers arriv in Saraisniemi proper. They spent the evening in co pany with Miss Forselles, superintendent of the wor house, and Miss Gripenberg, superintendent of the orphana of the parish. On Thursday, a visit was made to a manu training school for boys, conducted by the civil engine Alopaeus. The night following, the travelers reined up Frantsila church village, where the hostelry-keeper had on one room to offer to the party of four. Next day Heisk was reached. Here the travelers were invited to inspect t rural high school by its superintendent, Mr. Kerkkonen. mixed chorus rendered patriotic hymns.

Dr. Klopsch arrived in Uleaborg Friday evening. At A.M. the following day, the members of the Relief Committ in Uleaborg county, paid their respects in person, on whi occasion the county controller Levonius, in a sincere speec voiced his countrymen's gratitude for the magnificent pec niary assistance that had been received from Americans f the sufferers. He particularly thanked Dr. Klopsch and t contributors to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund for taking t initiative in this great relief work. Dr. Klopsch inquired abo the approximate number of famine sufferers in the count and also asked how much money it would take to keep the in decent circumstances until August. Dr. Relander volu teered the information, that 25,000 mark per week would needed, according to his estimate. Before the audien came to an end, Dr. Klopsch told those present, that he h that very day given the Relief Committee 50,000 marks fro THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund, to be used for the suffere

He resumed his journey northward from Uleaborg on t following Monday. He found out that the accounts of t suffering have by no means been exaggerated.

While in Uleaborg, Dr. Klopsch was serenaded by abo one thousand school children from the public, preparato and kindergarten schools. The little ones sang, under dire tion of M. Pallari, "Olet maani armahin," "Tuotta taiv hasta," and "Mun kanteleeni kaunoinen." The Americ visitor received the ovation from the steps of his ho (Societetshuset), up which ran the children, showering flo tributes in plenty. To the great mass of people in front the hotel, numbering several thousand, Dr. Klopsch said:

"I thank you for having come here to extend your gre ings to me in this way, and through me to those good peop in America who have helped Finland. I love children. my own country I have charge of a large institution. It is summer home for children. While traveling here I ha observed that your people honor with song those they lo This is a very beautiful custom, and I have taken a liking it. When I return to America I will tell my people of t custom. God bless you, God bless the Finnish people."

Writing from Kajana, Finland, Mr. Gilson Willets sa THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief party traveled in op sledges and on skis, over forest, lake and river, across fie of virgin snow, in a temperature far below zero. Part of t time, a snow-gale was raging. Some nights were passed the open, others in the uncomfortable post-houses. Amo the population the travelers found famine conditions wor than anticipated, fully corroborating reports. The wo would come in April and May. In one poor home, five ch dren were found who had subsisted since October on t hard black bread made from flour furnished by the Comm tee. It had been their sole food—not even a drop of mi being obtainable for the youngest, a baby. All the childr were abnormally distended with this starvation diet. Th had neither fire nor food, very little clothing. The America brought in a dozen loaves.

In other homes, they found women and children who h eaten nothing but black bread and frozen potatoes f months. Milk was an extreme rarity. The children were marked by the famine that they looked aged. These po sufferers had endured hardships so long that they had b come indifferent to life or death. Yet their hearts melte and their eyes filled with tears when the American visito brought them the long-hoped for and prayed-for relief.

During their tour, Dr. Klopsch and his party carried a co siderable quantity of supplies, and gave personal aid to eve really necessitous case with which they came in contact. one remote section, a family of fifteen was found, represer ing three generations, and all huddled in one room. Th kept the vital spark alive with hunger-bread alone. Son were ill, and lying on beds of straw. Yet, despite i wretched condition, this family every day had prayers, a never relaxed its faith in God's goodness. The visitors ga them a large bag full of good bread. The Committee has no made arrangements to reach all the suffering districts a "hunger-bread" need now be eaten no longer.

At Sotkamo, Saleva, Petays, Kutako, Tisalini and oth villages visited, the Relief party gave "first aid" to the star ing, in the form of substantial food. Cabins, cottages, po children's homes and similar places were visited and the co ditions noted. Among others who met and discussed far ine conditions with Dr. Klopsch were Rev. Mr. Wayryne of Kajana, and Director N. J. Hjelman.

The President's Tour

SELDOM has so extensive a tour been planned by a President, as that on which President Roosevelt has started. Setting out on April 1, he intends visiting twenty-four States, and stopping one hundred and thirty-four cities, where he will iver speeches. The journey involves 13,581 miles of ilroad travel, and is expected to occupy sixty-six days. will extend from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and m the Mexican border to the Canadian line. Alphaically arranged, the States and Territories the Presit will visit are Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, nois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Maryland, Minnesota, ssouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, rth Dakota, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South kota, Utah, Washington, Wisconsin and Wyoming. e President proposes to make a stay of sixteen days the Yellowstone National Park, and four days in the semite National Park. In the former pleasure- ound, he will have the advantage of the society of n Burroughs, the poet-naturalist, under whose guid- ce he is sure to obtain a good idea of the wonderful rk. In the Yosemite, John Muir, the famous natu- ist, will be his companion, aided by Le Conte, the le Yosemite guide. The President hopes to make

hief in Clerical Garb

A robbery was committed in New York a few days go by a man who adopted a particularly shameful ruse. e dressed himself in the attire of a minister and spoke a sanctimonious key. Going to a house in a fashionble district where there was an apartment to rent, he ngaged it, after being assured that his studies would ot be disturbed by piano-playing or other noises. He had been amputated. As it was thought he might become a public charge, he was sent back to his home. In November last, he presented himself again, having been in correspondence with a fellow-countryman resident in Philadelphia, who was able to give a guarantee that the country would not incur expense by admitting him. Through some informality, the Commissioners rejected the guarantee, and again sent the would-be citizen back to Austria. Arrangements have now been made through the Austrian Consul for the acceptance of a bond of indemnity, and the immigrant is now, for the third time, on his way hither. Most men would have been too much discouraged by a double rejection to have made a third attempt, but this man persists, and is now likely to succeed. It is much to be wished that men were as determined to enter the kingdom of Christ, for in that case persistence is sure of success.

The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and men of violence take it by force (Matt. 11: 12).

Engineers Who Fail

An eminent railroad authority, speaking recently to young men who are studying to become engineers, dwelt on the qualities necessary for success. He said: "A man who has any disposition to indulge in the use of alcoholic stimulants, or who has trouble of any sort to disturb his mind, should never undertake service as a locomotive engineer. It is when the engineer is not exactly himself, whatever may be the cause, that the vital test seems to come nearly every time. Sometimes it is a great wreck which results, because the mind of the engineer is not equal to the occasion. I have never known one engineer of gloomy and melancholy disposition to grow old in the service of engineer. Such men are either killed or discharged from the service before they have worked any great length of time. I have known several men who had domestic trouble of various kinds, and of them I do not remember one who ran an engine for more than five years. It seems that they cannot concentrate their minds or cannot keep them concentrated upon what they are doing. I have known some of them to forget, after getting the green, whether they had a green block or a white block, and to run at a speed beyond their control straight into the rear of another train." Similar warnings are given by the Apostle to those who would take service in Christ's cause:

No man that warreth entangleth himself with the affairs of this life; that he may please him who hath chosen him (II. Tim. 2: 4).

Menaced with Blindness

An employee of the Board of Education in New York has narrowly escaped a severe affliction, which was brought on by an inadvertence. She had been examining some public school-books, and soon afterwards complained of pain in her eyes. As it became worse she consulted a physician, who, recognizing that the case was serious, called an eminent oculist in consultation. He pronounced the case one of specific ophthalmia of diphtheretic origin. In a short time one eye was completely covered with a thin membrane and the other was badly inflamed. For several days it seemed as if the patient would permanently lose her sight. Skilful medical treatment has now subdued the inflammation and the membrane has been removed. It is now hoped that the patient is on the way to recovery. The doctors believe that the books she was examining before the attack, had been used by a child suffering from diphtheria, and that after turning over the leaves she had rubbed her eyes, thus carrying the infection to those organs. This is quite a new danger to come from books. We have long been familiar with dangers of other kinds which come not from the books having been handled by diseased persons, but from their contents. This is a much more common danger against which every one should be on his guard, for among popular works are many that belong to the order described by the Apostle:

Shun profane and vain babblings; for they increase unto more ungodliness (II. Timothy 2: 16).

A Persistent Immigrant

A man is now on his way to this country from Austria who has been twice turned back by the Immigration Commissioners. Early last year he came, but on examination, it was found that the thumb of his left hand

Without God in the World

By EMMA BATES HARVEY

As a child, I hated God. I look back with wonder now at the thoughts and forms by means of which my childhood fancy repressed and expressed this emotion. I think this hatred was an inheritance to me; for my father was known throughout our county as an infidel lawyer, who was a personal friend of Ingersoll.

In the Puritanic New England town where a man's theology so frequently dictates his caste, we were pariahs, indeed. When my dear mother was alive, it was all different. My mother loved God, and had she lived, I have often thought how my whole life might have been changed. Even when a mere baby, because I loved my mother, I refrained from showing my lack of appreciation, when daily I was taught certain portions of the Scripture. For the same reason, too, my father did not interfere, but looked upon this teaching of my mother as a mere simple fancy, that would do neither harm nor good to anyone. When only nine years of age, my mother died, or in the language of the village minister, "The Lord took her!" From that moment I hated the power represented by the words, "The Lord," even more intensely, and my greatest comfort was that my father, too, hated God even as I did.

I remember well the call of the minister after the funeral. My father and I were alone in the great parlor. How our hearts ached in their awful loneliness! The minister was embarrassed, and so were we. In the doorway, tall, thin and spare, with a little stoop in his shoulders, he stood. I was a child, and the principal thing I saw about him was that stoop. With a deprecating cough, he began: "I have come to see if there were anything I could do——"

My father arose and said: "I thank you, but there is nothing," and remained silently standing, waiting for the minister to take his departure.

But the minister had a New England conscience, and was honest in believing he had a mission to perform to us, and as I look back at the little scene now, I can see how heroically he performed it.

"I beg your pardon, Brother Holbrook," he stammered, "but don't you—won't you and the little boy see it your duty to attend church sometime now? You see——" He stopped, exhausted and embarrassed.

"What for?" my father quietly remarked.

"What for!—why, you might get help, you know! And then, too, you musn't let this little man grow up a heathen right in our midst, because the good God has taken his mother away. Won't——" But he got no farther.

While talking, he had been nervously patting my head. I could stand it no longer. I jerked away from under his ministerial arm, and fairly screamed: "I will be a little heathen if I want to," and I rushed into my father's arms for comfort. I have only a dim recollection of the rest of the scene, but have a vague idea that Rev. Mr. White left the house somewhat exhausted. From that moment he became my legitimate prey, to persecute as only a wide-awake, mischievous New England boy can. I have often since thought that my father had a far greater knowledge of these youthful escapades than I imagined, but once, and once only, did I carry my pranks to such an extent that he was obliged to interfere.

A year or two after my mother's death we had a hired man, whom I detested. At this time, in the category of my natural enemies, I had placed God first, Rev. Mr. White second, and our hired man, Dan Martin, third! He was ignorant, quick-tempered and arrogant—qualities too akin to those that constituted my own temperament to permit us to get along at all well together. Dan's most vulnerable point was his love for Hannah Lee, the village dressmaker, a spinster of uncertain age to herself, but of a certainty some ten years the senior of Dan Martin. To both of them this was really an affliction, for although very fond of each other, the discrepancy of their ages was the joke of the villagers, and had caused them many a trying moment.

Hannah's favorite color was virginal pink, and this, with cork-screw curls and maidenly airs, did much in the eyes of Hannah to atone for surplus of years. She was so kind-hearted, so thoroughly good, and above all things so lost in admiration of her future husband, that Dan loved her faithfully, and admired even cork-screw curls, because they belonged to such a devoted little body. For several years they had, in the village parlance, kept company together, and now it seemed as if the time had come to witness the consummation of their happiness. They were going to be married! What a fiend the American boy can be at times! I could be one, and was! All the village was to the wedding, and I was there, too! The Rev. Mr. White arose. The organist was grinding out painfully from the old-fashioned organ Lohengrin's "Wedding March." I did not know this beautiful gem at the time, and I remember her execution of it simply made me wish that she would stop! But on she grinded, and up the aisle came the happy pair, arm in arm! Even the little curls on Hannah's head seemed trembling with happiness. Before the altar they stopped. A moment of hushed expectancy, and then the minister gave his characteristic introductory cough; he fumbled through the pages of his ritual, and, with a benign look at the waiting couple, began:

"Dearly beloved, you have assembled yourselves here before me to-day for the purpose of holy matrimony, which is a state honorable for all men." And here he turned a page, or rather two, for in some mysterious manner two had been glued together!

"Madam, you promise," he unconsciously continued, "to bring up this child in the holy admonition of the Lord, when of proper age to teach him the catechism, the Apostles' Creed, and—"

By this time the man, who had unconsciously rambled on, was vainly aware that something was wrong! He had somehow mixed the christening with the marriage service! The whole church was in an uproar. The bride was hysterical, and I, Oh little fiend that I was, I was congratulating myself on the success of the wiles of the wicked, when I felt myself yanked out of the seat, and hastily hurried out of doors by the not protecting, but avenging arm of my father!

Dear old man! One of the best things you ever did for your heathen son was your justly severe punishment of that day. My father never laid a hand on me, but at sunset, that night, he and I could have been found making pastoral calls. To pastor, Dan and Hannah in turn, was I compelled to make my humble apology, and when Mr. White in such a gentlemanly manner excused my heinous fault, for the first time I began to wonder why I had ever hated him so.

Until I was sixteen, my father superintended my education. I was taught early that religion, as understood by my neighbors, was a pitiable illusion. There were parts of the Bible that my father admired and used to discuss with me from merely a literary point of view. For some reason, that I was never able to discover, anything that pertained to Jesus Christ was specially distasteful to him.

"I FOUND MYSELF HASTILY HURRIED OUT OF DOORS BY MY FATHER"

I remember his saying once, "Phil, think as you want to, but of all the humbugs the world has ever produced, the myth of Jesus Christ is the greatest. Don't misunderstand me. I don't hate Christians or the church, Phil, but I pity them much as I do the Zulus in Africa. One calls his fetich a monkey, the other a being, half God half man. What's the difference?"

I admired my father. I knew well that in all the country around there was no one who could match his intellect in brilliancy or argument! What need to tell me to think as my father did? My greatest happiness was to be, to act, as he would!

One important factor of my childhood I have not yet mentioned. Her name was Edith White. The daughter of the hated clergyman was my boyhood's friend, and many was the long tramp together through the woods for earliest May flowers, for later nuts—that we took. Intellectually my equal, charming and dainty in her ways, Edith supplied an element in my life that represented to me all that was highest and best. On one subject alone did we have nothing in common, and that was religion. Until Edith was fifteen and I was seventeen, this troubled us but little. Her own attitude towards all religious subject against which I felt such active antagonism was one simply of indifference. Edith had several times inferred to me that her father was much exercised by this, but she apparently had not deeply considered the subject herself.

One Sunday night, when I had stepped into the little church a few minutes before nine o'clock to walk home with Edith, I found myself in a revival meeting. How my father had laughed at these excitements. Usually I had waited outside of the church, but that night some mysterious influence led me within. A neighboring minister was addressing the people, and as nearly as I could make out, was pleading with those who were not Christians to become Christians by going forward to the altar, and kneeling there.

My lip curled contemptuously. I felt proud that Edith was too strong-minded to be affected by such a performance, when, to my horror, I heard a loud "Amen!" from the minister, and saw Edith, my little friend, stand, and with tears streaming down her face, start forward for the altar! She was certainly considered an object for congratulation, for the "Amens" grew louder and louder. I did not listen to the prayers that followed. I could only keep my eyes on Edith and wonder what would happen next. It was not long to wait. She soon arose, and, with a smile of wondrous beauty, turned right around, facing us all, and then Edith, who was unusually diffident and timid, spoke out loud, clearly and sweetly, "Friends, I have a confession to make. I have sinned against Jesus Christ all my life, and now I have found him I will trust him forever. Pray for me!"

I must confess some wonderful power seemed to actuate her, for her words, simple as they were, strangely thrilled me. But the reaction soon came, and I felt disgusted with the whole business, its cheapness and publicity, and all. I did not feel as if I wanted to see her again that night, but hurried home alone. I felt aggrieved, wronged, and that in some way she had deliberately taken herself out of my life, and I felt more than ever bitterly towards Jesus Christ, whoever that was, as being the cause of all my unhappiness.

All the next day, I could not set myself to study or to work. Towards night, I wandered over the hills in the direction of a little chestnut grove, that only a few days before had been the scene of a merry little picnic on our part. Under one beautiful pine I soon saw Edith's white dress, and hurrying toward her, without a word flung myself on the ground at her side. Not considered beautiful by many, there was something about her that afternoon so wonderfully attractive that she almost frightened me. She was no longer the Edith I knew, but another and radiant creature. She slipped her hand in mine, and with eyes lustrous with a new found hope, said, "Philip, I have been wanting to see you all day. I am so happy. There is such a being as Jesus Christ, and I want to tell you to-day, that I know he is indeed the Son of God. Oh, Philip, for your mother's sake now, won't you learn to love God, too?"

What madness possessed me that I sprang to my feet, and pushing her away from me, exclaimed, "Love Him! I hate God, and the very name of Jesus Christ more than ever! Even your friendship would he take away from me." In great passion, I rushed away home, leaving her alone.

How vividly that little scene comes to me to-day! I can even hear over again the chirp of the cricket, and the plaintive note of a certain quail in a neighboring pine, while Edith's tones still thrill me, echoing again and again, "Won't you learn to love God, too?" The quail, in mocking tones, seems to repeat, "Love God! Love God!" And even the cricket's shrill note becomes a plaintive echo of "God! God!" God everywhere—but in my aching heart.

It was not long before Edith and I met again, but by tacit consent the subject of her religious experience was left untouched.

My father was ill. How I prayed that if there were a God, his life might be spared! But God took him, too, and in my anguish, my hatred for so cruel a God became greater.

MATING AND HOME-BUILDING

AT this season the birds are making love before our eyes, the pretty drama going on in eloquent and bewitching song and movement for the whole world to see. Robin and wren, thrush and oriole, catbird and meadow-lark, they are wooing and winning and mating, and then, with wn and fluff and twig and straw, are weaving their sts.

"In the spring," said Tennyson, "a young man's fancy htly turns to thoughts of love." Others than our tle brothers of the air are choosing their mpanions for life. The old fashion of ve will never lose its vogue, wherever ere are young people. Young people will mutually attracted, and, since all the rld loves a lover, older people will watch pastime with sympathetic eyes.

A word to the young man who is in love, t hesitates to bind himself in betrothal. hat is it you fear, dear knight of the rue- l countenance? Why do you call on some 'l whom you admire, not once, nor twice, t often, paying her very devoted attenns, yet never asking her to marry you? hy do you shrink from the definite step at would make her yours for life? In a ajority of cases, you put the blame on verty and prudence. She is in a very mfortable, or, perhaps, a very luxurious me. You cannot offer her wealth. You fuse to drag her down to privation. How n two live, you say, on an income that rdly supports one?

Prudence and discretion are not to be spised. It may easily be that you misterpret them, however. Are there any aks in your expenditure which might be opped? Some personal, unnecessary inlgence, like tobacco, which a young man really better without? How do you know at good management will do? I have en a very beautiful home carried on, on a ry small salary, by thrift and intelligent gality. At least, if you are fair-minded, lieve this, that the good daughter of a od mother will make a good wife. Beve that a girl, if she be worth anything, ll rejoice to share poverty with a hardorking and honorable man who loves her. ive her the chance to say yes or no.

Now, a word to the young lady. When a an wants to marry you, whatever his conition, let there be nothing clandestine out it. If a man cannot openly and in e face of the whole world marry a daughr from her father's house, there is, generly speaking, something wrong. Occasionly one hears of exceptional circumstances, it, usually, the lover seeking a wife, ould marry her in the presence of her th and kin. Secret marriages, elopements d the like are very undesirable.

This is the season for seeking a mate, r building a new home; this is the season love and of love's gladness.

uggets of Gold

In the days of the Forty-Niners the old alifornia prospectors sent home nuggets of old as they found them in the mines. A nugt might be large or small, but it contained some yellow e that was pure and worth owning.

I wish we might each of us search in the mines of knowlge for a nugget daily of pure gold. He or she who learns heart a Scripture text, just one, each day, will have a eat store of golden Bible nuggets laid up in memory. The e who reads a little in some good author every day, will be ually the gainer in mental wealth.

he Fine Art of Receiving

To receive friends graciously is in itself a fine art. However shy and reserved one may be by nature, however deient in acquaintance with manuals of etiquette, one may always show pleasure in extending a warm and cordial hand, in smiling, and in showing gladness. A cold and ungracious or indifferent manner in one's own house, is an unpardonable sin. A hostess, if she have invited guests on an appointed day, must take pains to treat all alike. To receive one acquaintance with marked politeness and the next with scant courtesy, is to show one's self somewhat untrained and ignorant in and of social usages. Any one who comes within your doors is entitled to a genial reception, and the fine art of entertaining, is never better illustrated than when people show that they are delighted to give a welcome.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—SARAH. The dignity that requires coddling is worth very little.

—AUNTY. You are the next best thing to a mother but you must not be surprised if the children prefer their mother to you. This is only natural.

—OLD MAID. You must call yourself a spinster, or a single woman, and please don't regard your condition as a reproach. I don't know how society could get along without you.

—JOHN JACOB. It is your wife's province to invite company to dinner, but most wives expect that good husbands will now and then bring a man home at an inconvenient time. He must then take pot luck.

—CLARA. When there are a half-dozen forks and spoons beside your plate take them in the order your hostess takes hers. Spoons are for different uses—soup, coffee, or sauces. A little observation makes such things easy.

—MARJORIE. If a lady open the door for you, do not hand her a card, but if you wish to leave it, watch your opportunity and leave on a table or the mantelpiece, or somewhere else convenient to your hand.

SPRINGTIME IN THE SOUTH

While yet old Boreas lingers here, with threatening in his mouth,
There are who watch the flowers appear; 'tis springtime in the South.
And there the blossoms scatter sweet, the breezes kiss the spray;
The birds to leafy nests retreat, and all the land is gay.

The Story of a Poem

SEVERAL weeks ago, a gifted writer in the Evening Post (New York), quoted, with approving comments, a poem which she had kept by her for many years. She did not know by whom it was written. As I wrote it, one summer morning in the long ago, and as thousands have loved it, I venture here to acknowledge my child, and tell its story.

This is the poem. It was originally published anonymously, in Harper's Bazar, for which it was accepted by the paper's first editor, the late Mary L. Booth, of honored memory. At once, and instantly, it was copied, until it literally encircled the globe, finding its way into city papers and country papers alike. Later, I included it in a volume of verse, published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Poems of the Household, on page forty-nine of which you may read:

OUR OWN

If I had known in the morning,
How wearily all the day
The words unkind would trouble my mind
I said, when you went away,
I had been more careful, darling,
Nor given you needless pain,
But we vex our own with look and tone,
We might never take back again.

For though in the quiet evening
You may give me the kiss of peace,
Yet it well might be that never for me
The pain of the heart should cease.
How many go forth at morning,
Who never come home at night,
And hearts have broken for harsh words spoken,
That sorrow can ne'er set right.

We have careful thought for the stranger,
And smiles for the sometime guest;
But oft for our own the bitter tone,
Though we love our own the best.
Ah, lips with the curve impatient,
Ah, brow with the look of scorn,
'Twere a cruel fate were the night too late,
To undo the work of morn.

Once, in a large audience in the West, I repeated this little poem by request. A lady and gentleman sitting in front of me clasped their hands and looked at one another. When the meeting was over, they came to me and said that they had read the poem on the morning of their wedding day, cut it out of a newspaper and carried it with them round the world, with never an idea of the author's name or personality.

If it has a message for any heart, it is because it emphasizes a truth that comes home to every one's experience. We are not on guard with "our own." So we speak the blunt or brutal word, out of a passing irritation, we are captious or cynical or despotic with "our own." Yet we do love "our own" the best, and when they leave us, what bitter tears drop on their silent graves! MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

An Informal Luncheon

Among the most charming ways of showing attention to a friend who may be visiting you, and whom you wish to honor, may be reckoned the luncheon to which women only are invited. You have an old schoolmate staying with you, or an aunt or cousin from a distant place. Ask to meet her six or eight agreeable friends, who know one another, or who are likely to have subjects in common. They arrive at the designated hour, one or half-past, usually, and probably keep on their bonnets or hats and their gloves until they are seated at the table. For a first course, grape fruit in halves, with the pulp removed from the skin, and put back, so that it may be easily eaten with a tea-spoon, then three or four strawberries added, and the whole sugared, is very nice. Follow this with bouillon served in cups. Creamed or fried or broiled chicken, with peas and potatoes may be the next courses; or broiled lamb chops, or any dainty meat may be substituted for the chicken. Then, have a salad of plain lettuce, or lettuce and tomatoes, or lettuce and chopped apples and celery. For dessert nothing is quite so popular as ice-cream and cake, but strawberries or preserves, or a delicate pudding or pie, will answer as well. Finish the luncheon with coffee.

Conversation should be general, not confined to one or two, or to neighbors at the table. If you know a funny story, tell it. You owe it, as hostess or as guest, to be bright and chatty at a party, and your mood can do much to make the party succeed.

People do not linger very long when the luncheon is over, it being polite to take one's leave almost immediately after this function.

The Heroism of Love and Duty ❋ Paul's Journey to Jerusalem

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR APRIL 26 ACTS 21: 9-12

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT—ACTS 21: 14: "THE WILL OF THE LORD BE DONE"

Leaves from Paul's Diary

IF Paul kept a diary, we can imagine it containing such entries as the following: Monday, April 24, A. D. 58. Departed from Miletus. Tender words and tears were in the farewells of my friends, who had come from Ephesus to bid me a last good-bye. We parted, never again to meet in this world. We kept in sight of each other, they on the shore and I on the ship, until the distance became a veil between us. My traveling companions were Sopater, of Berea; Aristarchus and Secundus, from Thessalonica; Gaius and Timothy, of Derbe; Tychicus and Trophimus, of Ephesus, and Luke, the beloved physician. After a sail of thirty or forty miles we came to the island of Coos, which greatly interested Luke as a physician, for there was located one of the greatest medical schools of the world, which, however, we could not take time to visit.

Tuesday, April 25. To-day we reached Rhodes, the sunny island of roses. While the ship was discharging a portion of her cargo we went up to the markets to purchase fresh fruits. The coins they gave us as change had a rose on one side and on the other Apollo, the deity of the people. My heart burned within me to preach the Gospel there, but I could not tarry, as I must be in Jerusalem at a certain date. I saw prostrate, the famous Colossus of Rhodes, one of the seven wonders of the world, a bronze image so huge that ships passed between its legs in entering the harbor, when it was in an upright position. It was of interest to me as a picture of how false religions would be overthrown.

Wednesday, April 26. This day brought us to Patara. The most distinguished citizen, we were told, was a certain oracle of Apollo, but we had no wish to make his acquaintance. Here we parted with our ship, not without regret, for upon its decks our little company had sat together in delightful communion upon the Word of God, for hours together. Earnest prayers had gone up for those who stood or sat as a fringe upon our circle, that they might listen to our words, leisure of the voyage giving them nothing else to do. A change of ship was necessary, because a larger, stronger vessel was needed to cope with the open sea that we were now to cross.

Lord's Day, April 30. This day we were in Tyre. On the way we had passed the familiar shores of the island of Cyprus, and I recalled to our group gathered on the deck the days when, with Barnabas, I had been privileged to carry the Gospel to many cities of that island. We were told that our ship would be seven days in Tyre, discharging her cargo and reloading. The city itself appeared to us like a great ship resting upon the water. But my chief interest in Tyre was to find some place where I could preach the Gospel during those seven days of enforced waiting. Inquiry brought me to a company whose hearts the Lord had touched, and through them large opportunity was afforded me to preach the Gospel in Tyre. Tender relations with the people quickly grew up, so that on our sailing day a large number of men, women and children accompanied us to the ship. We had our good-bye kneeling upon the seashore and praying together.

Wednesday, May 10. Having on Monday completed our sea voyage, and on Tuesday begun our overland journey to Jerusalem, after covering between thirty and forty miles, we came to Cæsarea, my third visit to this city. I was invited by Philip the Evangelist to become a guest in his home; and there I had delightful fellowship for ten days, for his family were all fellow-helpers with the truth. My stay in Cæsarea was a blessed opportunity to preach Christ. My friends tried in many ways to dissuade me from continuing my journey to Jerusalem, because they feared my life would be in danger from those who opposed Christ. But none of these things moved me, even the tragic warning of one Agabus, who had lately come from Jerusalem, who made his warning very emphatic by binding himself with my girdle to show that I should suffer bonds. When at last I departed from Cæsarea with my eight companions for Jerusalem, there were no expostulations, for my friends had become fully aware of my determination to go forward, even if it cost me my life. Their only words were: "The will of the Lord be done."

Wednesday, May 17. We reached Jerusalem to-day, on the very day of the Passover, and told the elders of the church what God had done by us among the Gentiles.

Illustration and Application

Finding disciples we tarried there seven days. Here is a most practical lesson for our times of much traveling. Wherever Paul tarried seven days, or even one, he found disciples, and worshiped and communed with them for mutual benefit. But to-day many a Christian, who is to be even seven months in a place, does not bring his church letter, or actively identify himself with the Sunday School or other church activities. It is less trouble to get a church letter than to pack a trunk, and it makes a very great difference to change "your church" to "our church." Cutting off that "y" adds much to responsibility and brotherly fellowship. Speaking of trunks recalls how many yellow letters, expired by the statute of limitations, have been smothered to death, even after they were packed in a trunk, because there was a delay that grew from days to years in taking them out and presenting them. Any week, any day may be our last, and we should therefore "find disciples" and seek opportunity to make new disciples, wherever we are, even for a day. It is a good rule to live as we would if we knew we had but a day. Let us repeat, until it becomes a rule of life, the following:

We should fill all the hours with the sweetest things
If we had but a day;
We should drink alone at the purest springs
On our upward way;
We should be from our sinful selves set free,
To work and to pray,
And to be what our Father would have us to be,
If we had but a day.—Mary Lowe Dickinson

Who said to Paul through the Spirit, that he should not go up to Jerusalem?—They thought they were prompted by the Spirit when they urged Paul to a cowardly and selfish retreat, in place of the ever forward march he was making to the post of duty, though he knew it was also the post of danger, and would become ere long the post of death. The man who talks cowardice and selfishness to himself or to his friends is certainly not moved by that Holy Spirit that transformed the cowardly Peter, who had denied Christ at his trial before Annas on a servant's accusation, but after Pentecost, in that same hall of the Sanhedrin, proclaimed the Crucified as Lord, in the face of his murderers, sitting as judges, with power to destroy him also. Here again is a much-needed lesson for our times, when so many Christians think they may turn aside from duty if it involves loss or hardship or peril. For example, how many church people think they are not bound to keep the Lord's Day, if to do so involves a loss of position, or even a day's wages! Such need to be reminded again and again that in the early church many a mother, with children clinging to her skirts, when asked the question, which was the martyr test, "Servasti dominicum? (Do you keep the Lord's Day?" replied firmly, "Deo confido (I believe in God, and therefore cannot do otherwise, whatever the consequences.") Beside such a fearless faith, beside the courage of Paul, who walked with steadfast tread into peril after peril (II. Cor. 11: 26), that had been foretold at the very beginning of his Christian life (Acts 9: 16), how mean the cowardice of the man who, to-day, bears the name of Christ and yet lives a cowardly, selfish life, unwilling to do any but easy duties!

Paul's Courage

They all brought us on our way, with wives and children.—Paul had won the hearts of all the church members in Tyre in a single week, so that when he sailed away they all turned out, even the children, to bid him good-bye. What a winsome reformer he must have been! We call John the apostle of love, but the thirteenth of 1st Corinthians and many other outbursts of love, and such scenes of loving fellowship as we have seen all along his journey to Jerusalem, show that Paul was hardly less entitled to that name. With all his Puritanism, his brave rebukes of sin in the church as well as outside, he knew how to "keep sweet." Like a skilled and kind physician, he kept his lancet in a perfumed sponge. And here again is a lesson for our times, when rampant sins call for brave rebukes, which Paul reminds us may be made more effective if the heart seasons them "with tears" (Acts 20: 31).

Paul's Winsomeness

"SO SHALL THE JEWS BIND THE MAN THAT OWNETH THIS GIRDLE"

Four daughters which did prophesy.—A Sunday School session is too short to debate whether a woman is warranted in becoming a pastor by the examples of Miriam (Exod. 15: 20), and Deborah (Judges 4: 4), and Philip's daughters, all of whom "did prophesy," which means, not foretelling, but forthtelling of whatever truth about the past, or present, or future God has given one to utter (Joel 2: 28). There are many men in the church who would be glad if some one would find a Bible passage telling them to keep silence in the churches. Whatever reason there was why women should not "teach" in the Corinthian church but "keep silence" (I. Cor. 14: 34, 35), evidently did not apply in Cæsarea, and does not apply in our choirs and Sunday Schools and mission fields. We can afford to waive the question whether a woman should pronounce the benediction, while she has liberty to teach classes of hundreds, young and old, the way of life (John 4: 28, 29; Matt. 28: 5-7).

I am ready to die.—As at Tyre, so again at Cæsarea, the disciples thought it kind to urge Paul to be a coward. They seemed to assume that if duty became dangerous, it ceased to be duty. When Agabus, a prophet—a good man, no doubt, but not good enough to be fearless—dramatically took Paul's girdle and bound his own hands and feet and said, "So shall the Jews in Jerusalem bind the man that owneth this girdle, and shall deliver him to the Gentiles," every Christian present except Paul thought the proof conclusive that he ought not to go to Jerusalem, even though God had ordered him to go there. To such cowardly friends Paul answered in substance, "I am ready not only to be bound, but even to die in the path of duty." Luther repeated that history when cowardly friends sought to stop him on the way to the Diet where he was to be tried, answering them, "It is necessary for me to go; it is not necessary for me to live." When a criminal, excusing his theft, repeated to the judge that common falsehood, "A man must live," the judge promptly replied, "I don't see why." A man must live—forever. Therefore let us live while we live, refusing to die to escape death. Let us repeat again and again the noble strain:

Living and Dying

There are times when a man "must" die.
Imagine for a battle cry,
For soldiers with a flag unrolled,
For soldiers with a sword to hold,
That coward's whine, that liar's lie,
"A man must live."

"Corporal," an old slave, believed with unalterable firmness in the truths brought to him. In his own simple way he was a good deal of a philosopher, and did not a little good by the every-day showing of his quiet faith. Finally the time came for Corporal to leave this world. The doctor said to him, "Corporal, it is only right to tell you that you must die." "Bless you, doctor, don't let that bother you; that's what I've been living for," said Corporal, with a happy smile.

The will of the Lord be done.—How like us were those early Christians, not alone in cowardice, but also in the dismal way they talked of God's will being done, as if to have God's will done instead of our own would be a dreadful trial to which we must be "resigned." Once in a while we strike the right note, as in the song, "We worship thee, sweet will of God." To Paul, God's will brought gladness even when it brought suffering, for he knew God's will is but the expression of God's love. Paul's writings are like a field full of springs in their frequent outbursts of joy, some of them springs in prison yards, some of them springs stained with his blood that yet overflow with triumphant gladness. We know almost nothing of sorrows ahead And this is one of God's great mercies, that we are called to bear only the sorrows of to-day. But Paul knew from the first that his salary would be "bonds and afflictions in every city." (Acts 20: 23).

Like Christ, he was in the shadow of the cross for years. But like Christ he walked joyfully because trusttully, knowing that through his sufferings blessings would come to men and glory to God. That was infinitely more desirable than a life of selfish cowardice. "He that saveth his life," said Christ, "shall lose it, and he that loseth it for my sake shall find it." Because he counted not his life dear, Paul doubly lives in a twofold immortality, on earth as well as in heaven. Since God's will is based on wisdom and love, let us learn to say joyfully, for ourselves and our friends, in brave unselfishness, "The will of the Lord be done."

A good lesson for Christians in "very wet Summer" or some sore trial, when storms are frequent and clouds almost daily obscure the sky. That is the very time to illustrate the "joy of the Lord" and "let a little sunshine in."

"I want my children to grow up strong and healthy, Dr. Falconer. What am I to do with them? They are so thin and white."

"Change houses, Mrs. Vulcan, I advise you. Do away with curtains and blinds. Better have roses in the cheeks than colors in the carpets! Insist on your chicks living in the sunshine. That is the secret of health and growth." Mrs. Vulcan followed her old friend's wise advice. She moved from the north house, and settled in one with a southerly aspect. She made the children follow the sun as he went from room to room. In the morning they played in the east room. In the afternoon they frequented the west nursery. And she found that white cheeks grew red; thin limbs stoutened; health took the place of sickness.

PEORIA'S UNIQUE GOSPEL MISSION

ON November 29, 1888, in a small room on Bridge street, in Peoria, Bacon Memorial Mission was established by Mr. Weston R. Gales and his Bible Class, in honor of the memory of Charles F. Bacon, the former teacher. So effective were the efforts of these earnest men and women, and so intensely tenacious was their faith in the outcome, that in the latter part of 1891 Mr. Charles A. Jamison, a merchant of Peoria, proposed to erect a building, which might give larger scope to the work.

CHARLES H. JAMISON

WESTON R. GALES

In October of the following year, the new building was completed, and it has ever since been under the control of Edward T. Munns, as Superintendent. In his latest report, he writes: "The mission has in all its undertakings the one definite object—to bring the individual to a saving knowledge of the truth." With this view, there have been organized special departments of labor of an industrial and economic character, and these have contributed to the success of the mission. Kindergarten work is done each morning. The attendance is large, and the school is in charge of a skilled teacher. Every Saturday, a sewing school is held, cared for by volunteers from the various city churches. The children are taught to make simple and convenient garments, which, when completed, are sold to the little ones for a mere trifle, that thereby the lesson of self-help may be emphasized. The Senior, Intermediate and Junior Endeavor classes meet on stated evenings during the week, and are in a most flourishing condition, both as to number and interest. The enrollment of the Sunday School is over three hundred, the primary department constituting nearly one-third of this number.

On each Monday night, the W. C. T. U. has charge of the work. About one hundred and sixty persons have signed the pledge during the past year. The Mothers' Meetings, held twice a month, are of special significance. Parents are permitted to bring their little ones, who are properly cared for during the exercises. These gatherings are meant to teach the lesson that happiness is a creation of the inner life, and not dependent upon environment. An address is usually given upon some important phase of domestic life and effort. The superintendent preaches every Sunday, both morning and evening, and nightly meetings are held during the week.

At least four thousand people are reached by the mission every month. During the heated term, open-air gatherings are held in different parts of the city, and cottage prayer-meetings are frequent.

An idea of the outreach of the work is suggested by the wideness of its touch with divers phases of city life. Mr. Munns officiated, during the year past, at forty-nine funerals and fifty-three marriages, while eighty-two professed Christ.

Mr. Jamison, who erected the building, is allied with many good works in Peoria, and in large measure meets the present expenses of the mission.

Material assistance has been furnished to hundreds of needy ones, and this care is always supplemented by a strong effort to keep in continued and constant touch with the persons aided. The work of the mission is unique and exceptional, in that it meets a need peculiar to river towns. For miles along the levee in Peoria are flat-boats and huts, peopled by men and women whose sole claim to any manner of citizenship consists in a permanency of domicile. Like barnacles on a ship these people cling, and the denizen of ten and fifteen years ago is still found at the old stand. To uplift them, and at least save their children from a life of degradation and crime, is a problem not easy of solution. A great part of the work of the mission is among this class, and so effective has been the effort put forth, that nearly every church in the city is indebted for increased membership to the Gospel message so faithfully proclaimed from the pulpit in the Bacon Memorial.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

C. N. P., Philadelphia, Pa., writes:

Some months ago a terrible sorrow came to me, which, for awhile, almost stunned me. I knew that my Heavenly Father was a prayer-hearing and prayer-answering God, so I took the matter to him. Gradually the storm passed away, and in God's good time all things were right again. Verily there is a God who listens to the cry of his trusting children.

M. D., Venango, Penn., writes:

Not long ago we moved to a strange city, and after a few months' work my husband fell ill and lost his situation. He was out of work for three months, and though we so often asked the Lord to give him work suited to his age and strength, there seemed no answer, and we were almost discouraged. I prayed again, and I said I would write and tell you when my prayer was answered, that others might be inspired to new faith as I had been. The Lord heard and answered, blessed be his name. My husband has work now.

Miss H., Oberlin, Kans., writes:

I do not write to tell of some special time that God has answered prayer for me, but to make known what a comfort and peace comes to me through constant communion with God in the daily walk of life. He not only hears and answers prayer in regard to the more important things in life, but helps me through all the little every-day trials.

E. S. P., Holton, Kans., writes:

I have neglected a promise I made to God three years ago. There was a terrible trial hanging over us. I prayed God to give us justice, and the difficulty was settled so easily that it seemed as if it could never have been hard.

A Mother (no address), writes:

My son was out of work, and I prayed many times that the dear Father would help him to find work and among good men, and the answer came sooner than I thought it would. I know God answers prayer.

Mrs. E. N. K., Winthrop, N. Y., writes:

When I read of the answered prayers in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I am reminded of how many prayers I have had answered miraculously in my darkest days and of a wonderful vision that has cheered me. The Lord deals with his children according to their necessities.

R. C. H., Troy, Penn., writes:

I want to acknowledge the goodness of the Lord in our family, in wonderfully changing a dear, wayward relative, into one whose spirit was that of meekness, goodness and submissiveness.

S. C., Louisiana, writes:

God does answer prayer. He heard mine about a dear boy who was given to drink.

Mrs. C. E. H., Minneapolis, Minn., writes:

As I have seen so many testimonials in your paper about prayers being answered, I also wish to join in giving glory to God for listening to the cries of his children. Some time ago my way was very dark, as I felt near the gates of death. I turned to the Almighty Father. He heard and helped.

S. A. S., Hicksville, O., writes:

For a long time I had a burden on my mind of a financial character. I left it with my heavenly Father in earnest prayer, and just did my best. I have come out all right. I rejoice in his love and power to help in every time of need.

C. R., Tyrone, Pa., writes:

I speak for one who wishes to thus testify to special answer to prayer. She supports herself and an aged mother. Her health failed to such an extent as to almost disable her for work; she asked God for special strength, which was given her. Many times the writer has received direct answer to prayer.

M. A. T., Rising Star, Texas, writes:

I wished to accomplish something which seemed almost impossible, but God gave me the victory. Not only in this case, but in many others, has he answered my prayers.

Preaching Christ on Canada's Canals

AMONG the efforts to reach with the Gospel special classes, is an interesting and useful work which has for many years been carried on along the route of the Welland Canal in Canada. The sailors on the vessels which ply on the canal know the work well, and even those who make no profession of religion acknowledge the kindness and the help that it is rendering. The missionary is a friend to them all, and his sympathy and advice are counted on by the men with no little appreciation. He visits them on board the ships and cordially welcomes to the little Bethel where he holds his services all who will come. Many a sad story has been heard from the men whose confidence he has won, and many a family on both sides the border has had reason to thank God for the restoration of prodigals who, through his efforts, have been led to Christ.

The work originated in the visit, more than thirty years ago, of a colporteur of the American Tract Society, who spent some weeks at St. Catharine's, disposing of the literature of that most valuable society. He found ready purchasers among the sailors, and was anxious to make a permanent station there, but the Society felt that in Canada they were outside their bailiwick, and that it would be better to let the work be managed by Canadian hands. It was promptly taken up by the Rev. Alexander McGlashan, who was then at St. Catharine's, and a meeting was called of the Christian people of the city, at which a mission was regularly organized. Money was subscribed to engage colporteurs, and a hopeful start was being made, when Mr. McGlashan fell sick and died. Mr. Cooley, one of the colporteurs engaged, had already seen enough of the situation to realize that an excellent opportunity for Gospel work was open, and he obtained permission to appeal to the sailors themselves for help. The response was generous, and a little Bethel was built for services. The work was then placed under the control of the Upper Canada Religious Tract and Book Society, under whose auspices it is still carried on. It is in charge of the Rev. Thomas Bone, whose bluff manner and hearty, cheerful disposition, have made friends for him all along the canal. He found on entering on his labors that the regulations of the Canal were a distinct advantage to his work. The locks were closed at midnight on Saturdays until midnight on Sundays, so that there was ample opportunity for Gospel effort on the stationary vessels. In 1881, the enlargement of the Canal was completed, and the mission correspondingly extended its operations. Mr. Bone still does his itinerating work on the vessels, but two missionaries are now laboring on the lakes, east and west. From the beginning until now, the blessing of God has rested on the effort, and many souls have been added to the Kingdom through its service.

nes build castles and lay out miniature arks. The little folks gave the retreat he name of "The King's Garden," and it as so appropriate that it stuck.

No one who has not visited the Settlement and witnessed the delight of the people in these various forms of helpfulness, can form any idea of the change it as worked in their lives. They regard he workers at the Settlement as their riends and neighbors. They go to them hen in trouble, sure of finding sympathy, ood advice, and ready help in emergencies. In cases of sickness, they know hat there are no kinder nurses, and when he worst is over, the workers will send he convalescent out of the reeking atosphere of the streets into the country, here, amid trees and flowers and grass, hey may grow strong again.

The three rooms on Madison street have ong been outgrown. A house taken on Henry street has proved too small and the ext house has been added, and still the uarters are inadequate. The work, now nown as the Jacob Riis Settlement, is so xtensive that a volume would be needed o fully describe its manifold ways of helfulness. The constant and ever present roblem is that of means to carry on the ork. It depends entirely on the gifts of eople who know how much it is doing to lleviate the suffering of the poor and righten gloomy lives. Often the funds re almost exhausted and only by some mely help, can some sick women or children be sent into the country, or some lothing, or an extra blanket, be taken into he homes where they are urgently needed.

Every summer THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Home at Mont-Lawn receives some of the children from the Settlement, and from other friends help comes in emergencies. God does not allow work, so thoroughly inspired by the Spirit of Christ, to fail for lack of means; but there are times when the faith of the workers is tried, and when they grieve at being unable to do more when so much is waiting to be done. Every dollar is thankfully received and is made to go as far as possible in Christ's service.

Like Dorcas of Old

On October 5, 1902, there passed to her reward, Mrs. Elizabeth B. Adams, the story of whose good deeds reads like a romance. She died at the residence of her son, P. A. Nourse, Fitchburg, Mass. Her home had been in Hopkington, N. H., then in Lowell, Mass. She also lived many years in New London, N. H., and was a member of the Baptist Church of that place. During the latter years of her life she was a constant attendant of the Highland Baptist Church, Fitchburg, Rev. A. T. Kempton, pastor. She was devoted to mission work for the colored race, and for men in prison. She was like Dorcas of old, in the goodly garments she had made for others. During the Spanish war and the war in the Philippines, she was constantly corresponding with soldiers on both sides of the fight, and gathering packages of good reading and sending them to men in prison, in the army, in hospital, or to missions. The paper she prized the most of all was THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Equipped with several copies of this journal, this aged woman carried on missionary work among the negroes of the South, and far-off Africa, in prisons and hospitals, among the families along the frontier, and in many places that were not reached by regular organization work. She has taken the paper for many years.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Waiting for God*

OFTENTIMES, when the desire of our heart is unfulfilled and our prayers remain unanswered, we are tempted to feel that the reason lies in our own hearts. Frequently it does, but not always. Have you never been in a situation where it would be a relief to you to find something wrong in your life? The assurance of being right with God that comes when waiting before him, you are almost tempted to distrust. You have practically decided that something must be wrong, else the answer to your prayer would come, and hence you feel bound to find something. But every season of self-examination and agonizing before God, results in the quiet conviction that you are simply to rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for him. What is the matter? Why, beloved, God is simply teaching you patience, for it is after ye have done the will of God that ye are to receive the promise. God is ripening and mellowing you. God wants you to be "perfect," that is, mature. He wants you to be "entire," that is, no part lacking. Just as the October sun flavors the apple, so it is the grace of patience that makes us a "savor of life" unto others.

Another reason why God frequently delays the answer to our prayers is the trial of our faith. The word "temptations" in James 1: 2 does not mean enticements to evil, but rather times of testing. Of the true meaning of the word, God's command to Abraham to offer up Isaac is an illustration. Satan tempts men, but God tests them. According to I, Peter 1: 7, it is not our faith, but the testing of our faith that is precious in God's sight. And let us remember that it is not our faith that God tests, but the faith of Christ in us.

The first thing the trial of faith accomplishes is the breaking down of what little faith we have of our own. Our faith will not stand the strain. The test of faith must continue till only Christ's faith in us remains. I was told recently of the method out West by which gold is purified. It is put into a furnace. The fire waxes hotter and hotter, and is allowed to continue till the sparks stop flying, when the gold is purified. The flying sparks are the dross which is being burned up. So God lets the testing fires of our faith wax hotter and hotter, and continue till the sparks stop flying; the sparks of impatience, murmurings and questions of all kinds. It is encouraging to remember that the faith of Christ is a tested and proven faith. In the wilderness he met the enemy and conquered him. There is no possibility, consequently, that the faith of Christ in us will break down. God knows just how far we can go and just how much we can endure; and when he can see reflected in us the image of his Son, he will put out the fires and we shall come forth as gold purified.

A Book of Common Sense

HERE are one or two wise sayings from a new book. Read them. Thereafter let them expand a little while in your mind.

"A man can always climb to the heights he can see—if he will."

"It is hard to think, and many shrink from the pain of it; but if a young man is dismayed at the cost of thought and turns away from it, he abdicates the throne of life."

"Potent as a young man's surroundings are, they are, after all, not powers. The man is the power. The circumstances of birth, education, companionship, are the chessmen in the game of human life; and you, young men, are the players."

"Everything that you find about you, when you come to yourself and realize something of your human potency, is to be used, worked over, moulded, as you will."

"Leaves in the book of life are not turned as easily as the leaves of a novel."

"A young man is better known by his neighbors than he ever dreams. They judge him by the sort of surroundings he chooses, the places he frequents, the comrades he consorts with, the recreations he takes."

"Take heed of ambitious thoughts when unaccompanied by ambitious efforts to carry them into action."

"Few poor men can any more appreciate and use the responsibility of sudden wealth than a blind man, who for the first time sees, can interpret and enjoy the gorgeous glory of a sunset. To fall up is often as disastrous as to fall down."

"The keenest joy of life is to that man who gets his bread and butter in the tasks that are a delight."

"When a man, under the ordinary circumstances of life, excuses himself from doing something because he has not the time, he really means that it is not of sufficient interest or importance for him to find the time."

About the Right to Marry

"No man is morally justified in marrying so long as he does not see his way clearly to the maintenance, in honorable independence, of a family.

"Love is no excuse. This is not orthodox, but it is better, it is common sense. One might as well plead his love of jewels as a reason for stealing diamonds. You are stealing something from a girl which neither you nor she can ever replace, for which you can never make up, if you marry her before you are well rooted in your life work and fruit bearing. You are stealing the joy of her girlhood."

Study the Marriage Contract

"A man usually reads a document before he signs his name assenting to its propositions. It is a very remarkable fact that many a man stands before the clergyman, hand in hand with the woman he has chosen to be his helpmeet, without once looking at the vows and promises he is to take, save perhaps the day before, in a hurried way, to see where his 'answers' come in, and this for the solemn act of life with which is bound up the lives and happiness of others."

On the Advantage of Having a Hobby

"What may be said for the encouragement of the man who finds himself harnessed to a task by which he earns a competence, but which is a task and nothing more? His is by no means a hopeless outlook. He may have a hobby.

"By a hobby, I do not mean a mere ridiculous whim. A hobby properly considered is a dignified pursuit. The fundamental distinction between a hobby and an avocation is, that your avocation rides you, and you ride your hobby.

"Avocation is usually bread and butter. Hobbies are appetizers. When the two are identical, and you have the supreme joy of earning the wages for life's needs in pursuit of the thing you like best, get another hobby.

"In other words, we should have some interest in life outside the treadmill of the daily task. It is good for any man."

These extracts are from The Young Man in Modern Life, by Beverley Warner, D.D. (Dodd, Mead & Co., 83 cents net.) It is a book of ideas and common sense. The advice of a man having experience and sympathy—a good sort, we would say. Quite naturally there is not a little going over old ground—but it is a fact, we enjoy reading the things we have thought, but have never got to the point of saying.

Called Higher

Miss R. Mae Baldwin, daughter of the late Mr. E. H. Baldwin, of Palmyra, Neb., writes:

"Dear Dr. Klopsch:—My dear father, who has been one of your oldest and most appreciative subscribers, passed to his long and happy home on January 10. The last request he made of me, just a few short hours before his death, was that I should write and thank you heartily for the pictures in the Art Gallery, which you sent with our subscription to the paper, and which he enjoyed so much, though he was too weak to express them to you in words. I asked him, through my tears—for I knew his hours were numbered—to tell me his favorite, so I might write it to you. He responded by pointing to 'The Evening Hymn,' while his face shone, as though he already heard the evening hymn of his noble, pure life being sung by an unseen choir. He then quoted Mr. Moody's words while on his death-bed, 'I shall soon be more gloriously alive than ever before.' You have lost an ardent admirer of your good paper, and one who thoroughly appreciated the worth of the most excellent and helpful articles, which were enjoyed each successive week by one whose pure soul could best enjoy purity of thought and language."

Notice has but recently reached this office of a death that will carry sorrow to numerous readers of this paper, who have become familiar, through these columns, with the gentle, faith-inspired poems of Phoebe A. Holden. 'Her death," writes a friend, "occurred in her Berlin home, Nov. 12, 1902. She was seventy-seven years old, eleven months and sixteen days. She was a lineal descendant of Daniel Holden, who came to this country from England about 1720, and settled in Nantucket. Miss Holden was a graduate of the Westfield Normal School, and taught many years in the high schools of Hinsdale and Lee, in Berkshire County, as well as in the schools of Berlin. She was a graduate of the Chautauqua Literary and Scientific circle class of 1885; and added more than fifty seals to her diploma. She delighted in literary pursuits and was a writer of much ability, contributing both prose and poetry to various periodicals. One collection of her poems was published under the title, Voices from Lakeview, and several of her poems have been set to music. Occasion of interest to her townspeople always inspired her pen, and so she was our poet laureate.' Miss Holden was chosen one of a committee of five to complete the history of Berlin. She was a member of the Berlin Congregational Church sixty-one years, and taught a Sunday School class many years.

QUAINT PSALMS for QUEER FOLK

By Rev. C. H. Yatman

PSALM CV
Psalm of Remembrance

4. Seek the Lord, and his strength: seek his face evermore.

"REMEMBER HIS MARVELOUS WORKS"

5. Remember his marvelous works that he hath done, his wonders, and the judgments of his mouth;

6. O ye seed of Abraham his servant, ye children of Jacobhis chosen.

7. He is the Lord our God: his judgments are in all the earth.

8. He hath remembered his covenant for ever, the word which he commanded to a thousand generations.

Memory is immortal; well is it for folk to use it here and not wait until it becomes a bane instead of a blessing. To remember the works of God is to help greatly in walking in the ways of God. A thousand generations may pass ere God forgets his covenant. No, he never forgets. Let us remember our covenant and holy vows made when uniting with the church. More, let us keep them.

PSALM CVI
Sinner's Psalm

43. Many times did he deliver them; but they provoked him with their counsel, and were brought low for their iniquity.

"THOSE THAT CARRIED THEM CAPTIVE"

44. Nevertheless he regarded their affliction, when he heard their cry:

45. And he remembered for them his covenant, and repented according to the multitude of his mercies.

46. He made them also to be pitied of all those that carried them captives.

All Psalms are for the sinner, but this one shows him in historic life and light. Here he is in the mire of iniquity. The backslider is, of all wicked folk, the worst. "They fall deepest who fall backward into hell." Well may the beginning of his day, like the beginning of this Psalm, say, "Oh visit me with thy salvation."

PSALM CVII
Thanksgiving Psalm

8. Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!

"HE SATISFIETH THE HUNGRY SOUL"

9. For he satisfieth the longing soul, and filleth the hungry soul with goodness.

The whole world should have a yearly "Thanksgiving Day," and Presidents, Kings, Queens and Emperors should appoint this Psalm to be read in every church, chapel and cathedral; not only there, but at every table before the bountiful meal is served, with all the family about the board. "Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men."

PSALM CVIII
Exaltation Psalm

3. I will praise thee, O Lord, among the people: and I will sing praises unto thee among the nations.

4. For thy mercy is great above the heavens: and thy truth reacheth unto the clouds.

5. Be thou exalted, O God, above the heavens: and thy glory above all the earth.

When a soul exalts God, then the humble are set on high. Folk who fix their heart on him, may bravely boast of valiant doings. All the Shechems and Succoths, the Manassehs and Moabites bow at last to those who go forth with the Lord. Vain is the help of man. Great is the help of God.

perilous journey to the Amazon, through the heart of the Continent.

In another letter, Mr. Olsson writes:

I hope to make a trip next week up the Uruguay River, at Mercedes. The people there are calling for a preacher of the Gospel.

During January, February and March, 1902, I traveled over 3,000 kilometres with my Bibles. I circulated 144 American Bibles, 94 Testaments and 20 portions, calling at the following places on my way, Temperly, Cannalos, Lao Flores Maipur, Mar del Plata, Mira Mar, Bolcarse, Neeackea, Tandul, Tres Arrayos, Bahia Blanca and El Puerto. I believe that in many places the precious seed has fallen into good ground and will bear fruit.

If some Christian friends would aid us, we could buy a mission farm suitable for industrial and school training for interpreters for the Indian Gospel work. We need this for missionary work. If in the port of Buenos Ayres people are to be found who never heard the story of the Cross, what awful darkness must there not be in the great interior of South America, where I traveled over 3,000 miles without even meeting a single Protestant missionary! God will hold Christian America responsible for the evangelization of this land, with its millions dying without the Gospel of Christ. EMILIO OLSSON.

FOREST INDIANS OF SOUTH AMERICA

Missionary Olsson has opened a large hall in Buenos Ayres, where he preaches the Gospel in Spanish. He carries his work into the interior at frequent intervals, and has been successful in reaching many tribes who never heard the truth till now. South America, with its seven million square miles of territory, and its population of forty million, has only one preacher to every two million souls.

PAUL'S VISIT TO PHILIP

The Prophesying Women Not Restrained

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

THERE is much significance in the visit which Paul paid to Philip the deacon, as described in Acts 21: 8-14. "And on the morrow we departed and came into Cæsarea: and entering into the house of Philip the evangelist, who was one of the seven (Acts 6: 5; 8: 5), we abode with him. One of the seven deacons, and the man who had been used in the awakening of the entire city of Samaria; it must have meant much that he should meet with Paul, the apostle of the Gentiles. As iron sharpeneth iron, so the countenance of a man his friend (Prov. 27: 17). And as these two men were more than friends, brethren, and more than brethren, fellow members of the same body (I. Cor. 12: 13), this meeting must have been of deep interest in heaven.

"Now, this man had four daughters, virgins which did prophesy"—i. e., they spoke unto men "to edification, and exhortation, and comfort" (II. Cor. 14: 3). Paul, who seems to have had fellow-helpers, men and women, who "labored with him in the Gospel" did not restrain them. Contrary to some in the present day, he said, "I would that ye all prophesied" (I. Cor. 14: 2). "Ye may all prophesy one by one, that all may learn and all may be comforted" (ver. 31): but he cautions the Corinthian women to prophesy with their heads veiled or covered (I. Cor. 10: 5, 6, 10). And lest the prophesying—which must be in the Spirit to be prophesying at all—should be taken advantage of by women to talk or chatter in the assembly, Paul says, "Let your women keep silence in the churches or assemblies: for it is not permitted unto them to speak [or talk], but to be under obedience, as also saith the law" (I. Cor. 14: 34). But Paul never forbids man or woman to testify—i. e., to speak in the Spirit. He would be the last to quench the Spirit thus.

In the Old Testament, as in the New, there were prophetesses (Exod. 15: 29; Jud. 4: 4; I. Sam. 2: 1-10; I. Sam. 22: 23-31; II. Chron. 34: 22, etc.). It was the prophecy of Joel 2: 28, quoted by Peter on the Day of Pentecost, that sons and daughters, servants and handmaids, should prophesy, and Peter did not rebuke any of the prophesying of those women who formed a large part of the hundred and twenty who, filled with the Spirit, spoke to the multitudes as he "gave them utterance" "the wonderful works of God" (Acts 2: 4-11). Any man, be he minister or not, who really knows the fullness of the Holy Spirit in his own soul, would shrink from quenching God, the Holy Ghost, when he chose to make a woman his voice for the time.

The stay of Paul and his company at Cæsarea was "many days," and during that time "there came down from Judea a certain prophet, named Agabus" (probably the same as in Acts 9: 27, 28). He "took Paul's girdle, and bound his own hands and feet, and said, Thus saith the Holy Ghost, so shall the Jews at Jerusalem bind the man that owneth this girdle, and shall deliver him into the hands of the Gentiles." It was a word from the Lord on the line of much the same effect which had been said to him before: but Paul saw it to be only a temptation, when the Cæsarean disciples and the men of his own company sought to deter him from going to Jerusalem. "What mean ye," he said, "to weep and to break my heart? For I am ready not to be bound only, but also to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus." And when he would not be persuaded, we ceased, saying, The will of the Lord be done. The Church had spoken by the Holy Ghost; Paul had never said, God sends me to Jerusalem, yet when he would not hear, they on their part would not argue, but trusted all to God. This is the Spirit of Christ.

And so, in spite of all, the plan was carried out, and Paul and his company reached Jerusalem, "Mnason, an old disciple," traveling with them to give them hospitality. The day after their arrival they sought an interview with James and the elders, and Paul told particularly what things God had wrought among the Gentiles by his ministry. They glorified God—they could not do otherwise; but Paul found that his presence caused difficulty. When we are in the direct line of the Spirit's leading, all things fall into shape, and a clear way, without strain, is made before us. The elders proposed to Paul that he should adopt the course of joining men which had a vow, as a proof that he kept the law, in order that the prejudices of the Jews against him might be met. Such a stratagem is so unlike the ordinary life of the apostle, there is in it so much of human wisdom, that it looks like a departure from the clear, straightforward walk of the apostle. One doubtful step, in which we have not the undoubted direction of God, may lead to a course which is in some way very unworthy of our faith, as not reflecting the full glory of God. God would easily have managed the Asiatic Jews, and the stratagem was unsuccessful.

MISSIONS IN THE ARCTIC*

Efforts by the Moravian Brethren and the Presbyterian Church to Reach the Esquimaux

COLD, nor heat, nor miasma, can be regarded as a barrier to the zeal with which the self-sacrificing missionary goes, bearing the standard of the Cross. In the Arctic as in the Tropics, there are souls which Christ died to save, and thither the missionary must go with the good news that the soul that believes in Him shall not perish, but have everlasting life.

As far back as 1752, a mission was begun by the Moravians among the ice peaks of Labrador. The pioneer was John Christian Erhardt, a sailor, who was converted on the Island of St. Thomas in 1741. In the course of his voyages, he visited the Arctic, and there found such utter ignorance of Christianity that he abandoned a seafaring life, and with four companions went to Nisbet harbor and began work in a wooden hut. The whole party was treacherously murdered. Two brave men, Haven and Drachart, volunteered to renew the work, and a mission was established at Nunengoak Bay, which has been the means of many conversions.

Thus encouraged, the Moravians began work in Alaska. Wainland and Killbuck, the latter a converted Delaware Indian, were the leaders in this new field. They established a mission which they named Bethel, on the Kuskokwim River. This also was a success, and has done excellent service. Subsequently another mission was begun near Fort Alexander, to which the Moravian brethren gave the name of Carmel. A good work has been done here, especially among the children, through whom the parents were reached.

The man who has probably done more than any other for the propagation of the Gospel on our own side of the Arctic Circle, is Dr. Sheldon Jackson, who went to Fort Wrangel in 1877, and from that point journeyed through long stretches of country. After long effort, he succeeded in introducing reindeer into the region, by which the people have gained prodigiously, both in locomotion and in increased comfort. Dr. Jackson was reinforced later by Dr. and Mrs. McFarland, and other missionaries of the Presbyterian Board, whose heroic devotion passes all praise.

MISSIONS TO IMMIGRANTS†

The Vast Mission Field of the Foreign-Born Population

WORK among the foreigners who come to settle among us is a duty incumbent on us as patriots, as well as Christians. History furnishes no other instance of a nation being under the necessity of assimilating on so large a scale an immigration so heterogeneous as that which we receive. It is simply marvelous, that men should come from every nation under the sun and should be absorbed so easily and quickly into our national life. Their children grow up as Americans and identify themselves with us, accepting our traditions and adopting our ideals. Not only the enterprising and industrious come, to find an opportunity for a better life than is possible in their native land, but men who have disgraced themselves and their families come to escape the consequences of their wrongdoing. Yet out of this mixed material the nation is being built up on the lines laid down by the fathers of the Republic, and the principles that were their guide still rule our national life. It is a wonderful spectacle, unprecedented in history.

While we have reason to congratulate ourselves that this great flood of immigrants has had no disastrous effect on our political and social life, there is reason to fear that it has not yielded the spiritual harvest that it should have done. The churches have not increased so fast as the population. The new comers, while taking their places in business, social, and political life, must have held aloof from our religious life to a very large extent. This is partly due to their own prejudices, but we are not altogether free from responsibility. Our efforts to reach them with the Gospel have not been equal to the opportunity. Much has been done to influence the Chinese and the Italians, but little has been done in view of the numbers that have come. The task was formidable, but that fact should have evoked the greater effort. So with those who have come from the Balkan States, for whom comparatively little has been done. It is a missionary field within our reach, which is urgently demanding our attention.

Where Paul was Shipwrecked

THE following letter, written from Malta, by Rev. Ezra T. Sanford, Pastor of Calvary Baptist Church, Hackensack, N. J., who, in company with a number of Americans, is visiting Bible lands, will interest many readers:

On February 23, one of America's patriotic days, while many Bible-lovers in our homeland were taking their morning look into the Book of Books, our good ship Aancin, was entering the harbor of Valetta, on the eastern shore of the little island of Malta. The day was bright, and dancing between the blue of the sky and the blue of the Mediterranean, our little boats carried us safely from ship to shore, and soon our feet trod the island, interesting not only to Bible students because of Paul's shipwreck there, but to students of history because of its connection with the crusades to the Holy Land. The first object of our visit was to stand upon the shore where Paul's ship was cast; to look into the waters of the little creek flowing into St. Paul's bay (Acts 27: 39), and to pick up as souvenirs some pebbles from the beach.

We took the narrow gauge railroad to Citta Vecchia, and from thence proceeded by carriage over an excellent highway to the fishing village by the bay.

The apostle came up the little valley by this route to the home of Publius, the Roman officer. I saw no reptiles around, except the lizards that crawl upon the rocks. The monument erected upon the island, the agreement of geographical surroundings of the bay with Scripture narrative, impress the visitor with a sense of the truthfulness of Biblical portraiture. The fact that Paul spent the winter there and sailed in the ship of Alexandria, leads me to believe that his vessel was anchored in the Bay of Malta, at Valetta, near where we saw two great English warships casting anchor. Publius, the Roman officer, whose father Paul healed of a fever, must have lived near this harbor in winter, keeping, perhaps, a summer house at Citta Vecchia, the highest point inland, as one tradition states. The Knights of St. John, who, during the crusades, built a church near this Valetta harbor, believed that their cathedral covered the spot where once stood the Roman Governor's dwelling. Our visit was on the first day of the peculiar carnival which the people of the island hold preceding lent. The young men, arrayed in gorgeous costumes, throw confections along the street and up at gaily-attired maidens crowding the balconies.

IF RUSSELL SAGE TOLD YOU

That You Could Make a Fortune in BROOKLYN REAL ESTATE,

Wouldn't you be impressed? Especially if it were to cost you but $10 down and $6 a month till you'd paid only $510—wouldn't you act upon it?

Well, just read Mr. Sage's own words. We might naturally be considered as biased in our opinion—of painting New York's future in too rosy colors—but listen!

HERE'S THE OPINION and ADVICE

of one of the World's Greatest Investors and Financiers

Whose reputed wealth is One Hundred Millions.

(From the New York World of September 28, 1902.)

"I do not think the future of New York can be depicted in terms any too glowing. The most fanciful writers cannot exaggerate the greatness of its future.

"A man who buys real estate in any of the five boroughs—of course exercising average good judgment—has a fortune before him. Brooklyn is growing at the rate of 75,000 people a year.

"Young man, buy real estate in the outlying boroughs, and then work hard at your usual avocation. Your real estate purchases will make your old age comfortable." RUSSELL SAGE.

YOU can take advantage of Mr. Sage's advice now—it's within the reach and means of every reader of "The Christian Herald." We offer you, in the greatest of the outlying boroughs, the best property that the man of moderate means can possibly secure to-day. It's because our property is located in Brooklyn, that Mr. Sage's remark, "Brooklyn is growing at the rate of 75,000 people a year," becomes specially significant. Think of it! Three-fourths of all Greater New York's enormons increase in population—75% of the growth of all the "five boroughs" is poured into Brooklyn every year.

HIS WORD FOR IT, it will pay you to at least look into this. He says: "Of course exercising average good judgment." That is precisely what we say, and don't you think you'll be using good judgment to buy where 5,500 resident and non-resident investors bought $4,660,000 worth of lots during the past fourteen months and over eight million dollars' worth in the last four years? Hundreds of persons who purchased through the mails have been here to inspect their holdings and 75 per cent. of those who were in a financial position to do so, at least doubled their original purchase. Could there be a better endorsement than this? We know—any one who investigates it will know—you can know—that we have the greatest proposition in real estate ever made to the public, and that if you buy here and NOW you have a fortune before you!

at Our Properties

To keep in touch with the marvellous growth of New York at the present time, her tremendous building operations and almost incredible expansion, is to be convinced that her Brooklyn development must bring to the investor of to-day, within a very few years, thousands of dollars for his hundreds invested. The completion of the new bridges and tunnels now under way will mark a mighty advance in Brooklyn's population and upbuilding, with corresponding increase of land values. Our property is in the section first affected by this stimulus and even now showing greatest activity. It is right on the edge of the "density belt," which is rapidly overtaking and surrounding us.

FREE TRIP TO NEW YORK.

As a guarantee of good faith, we agree with all persons living East of Chicago to pay you in cash the cost of your railroad fare to New York and return, if you visit our property and find one word of this advertisement a misrepresentation; or in case you buy, we will credit cost of the fare on your purchase; to those living farther away we will pay a proportion equal to round trip Chicago ticket.

If you should die at any time before payments have been completed, we will give to your heirs a deed of the lot without further cost. If you should lose employment or be sick, you will not forfeit the land.

You have absolutely nothing to lose by writing at once for full particulars, or better still—mail us $10, the first payment on a lot, with the distinct understanding that we must return it to you if we have misrepresented our proposition in the slightest particular. Write under all circumstances. You would not be fair to yourself if you failed to look into this matter. Fill out the coupon and mail it to us to-day. That costs two cents and a minute's time. Isn't it worth while?

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

N. M., Locust, Ky. 1. Are the words regeneration and sanctification synonymous? 2. Is the command for women to keep silence in the churches still obligatory?

1. No; regeneration is, or should be, the beginning of sanctification. It is the new birth, the beginning of a new life, in which the soul grows and develops under the Holy Spirit's influence and Providential discipline, and is, as the apostle says, "changed into Christ's image." Sanctification is a life process tending all through to the perfect character. 2. It was undoubtedly first given on account of abuses in the Corinthian church. We doubt whether the apostle would have given it in our modern conditions. Even in his own time, he does not appear to have silenced Philip's daughters (Acts 21: 9). At least there is no record of his having done so.

M. M., Paterson, N. J. 1. What authority is there for the statement that Judas was red-haired? 2. Was hair of that color regarded with aversion in ancient times?

1. The authority is purely legendary. 2. Among some nations it was regarded as a mark of divine reprobation. Nebuchadnezzar's hair, according to tradition, changed to a reddish hue when he was convicted of sin. Among the Copts, in Egypt, there was a fixed detestation of the vivid color. On the other hand, it was and still is highly thought of by northern nations.

M. J. P., New Brunswick, Can. 1. Will a person committing suicide, while of unsound mind, be held responsible for self-murder? 2. How may we know that we have the Holy Spirit? 3. Is it right to close a Sunday School because few people attend?

1. You may be quite sure that God will deal justly with such a person. It is not for us to measure his responsibility. It depends entirely upon the state of his mind, and of that God is the only Judge. He never expects from us more than we are capable of giving. 2. The fruits of the Spirit are enumerated in Galatians 5: 22, 23. There is no better way of learning whether the Spirit is in the heart than in noticing whether the fruits are found in the character. 3. It depends on the circumstances. If there is no interest in the school, there is no benefit in keeping it open. A better way, however, would to to canvass the neighborhood, and bring in new pupils.

Mabel, Brooklyn, N. Y. To what is due the custom of wearing orange flowers as bridal wreaths?

It is said to be of Saracenic origin, and to have been introduced into Europe at the time of the Crusades.

E. L., Ada, O. 1. Who invented the loom? 2. Is weaving the oldest industrial art? 3. Why do some public schools give instruction on hand-looms? Does not this look like retrogression?

1. The Egyptians are supposed to have been its inventors. 2. It has been so stated by good authorities. It dates back so far that none can say when it had its beginning. After Adam's coat of skin, came the simla, a piece of cloth woven of grasses or wool. 3. Training the hand trains the perception and the will and develops the moral nature, so educators affirm. Simple, primitive tools leave much for the hand to do. Patience, perseverance and delicacy of touch are created or increased by hand-weaving.

Subscriber, Brooklyn, N. Y. Is the phrase "Cleanliness is next to godliness" in the Bible? If not, where did it originate?

The expression has been attributed to many writers of different nations. The earliest is believed to be a passage in the Talmud. The last Mishna of Sota says: "Carefulness develops into vigor; vigor into guiltlessness; guiltlessness into abstemiousness; abstemiousness into cleanliness; and cleanliness is next to godliness."

L. E. S., Toronto, Ont. A sceptical friend assures me that all the leading doctrines of Judaism, and much that has survived in Christianity, have been derived from more ancient religions. Can this be true?

It would be surprising if there was no correspondence between the ethical principles of Judaism and early religions. The conscience of man would ensure that. The Persian or the Egyptian, trying to attain the highest life, and trying to help the people of his time to live for better things than mere animal gratification, would inevitably get light similar to that found in Moses and the prophets. There are traces to be found of such men in ancient literature. It is not necessary, however, to suppose that the Jews borrowed from them. Two men earnestly seeking the same object may, independently, arrive at the same conclusion. One thing is clear, that if the Jew borrowed from earlier writers, he purified and elevated his material. No older system of morals has been found, nor any religion at all comparable to that to be found in the Old Testament Scriptures.

L. J., Centerville, Ala. Kindly give history of Handel's "Messiah."

The oratorio was completed September 1, 1741, composition having occupied Handel fourteen days. It is said his tears mingled with ink as he penned the notes, and that he wrote it kneeling. Of the "Hallelujah Chorus," he says: "I did think I did see all heaven before me, and the great God himself." March 27, 1742, an advertisement appeared in London of "Mr. Handel's New Grand Oratorio," to be given for relief of "Prisoners in Several Goals, and support of Mercer's Hospital and the Charitable Infirmary on the Inn's Quay." It was rendered April 8, 1742, before a "most Grand, Polite and Crowded audience." Ladies were requested to come "without their Hoops, as it will greatly increase the Charity, by Making Room for more Company."

R. S., Albany, N. Y. How is it that the descendants of Abraham of whatever tribe are called Jews?

The name was applied to the inhabitants of Judea. Its first mention in the Bible is II. Kings 16: 6. After the downfall of the Northern kingdom, sometimes called Israel and sometimes Ephraim, the kingdom of Judah alone survived. Efforts have been made to identify the Anglo-Saxon race with the descendants of the people of the Northern kingdom, but the only descendants of Abraham who have preserved their identity, belong to the tribe of Judah, or of Benjamin, which was absorbed in it.

Young Man, Newton, N. C. Can a man work on the Sabbath at such work as street car and railroad work, and live a Christian life?

Works of "necessity and mercy" are justifiable on the Sabbath. If he has no other means of livelihood, he is justified; but not if he makes a deliberate preference of work which involves Sabbath desecration. A Christian, under the circumstances, would endeavor at the earliest opportunity, to make such a change as would permit him to enjoy full Sunday privileges.

Student, Bridgeport, Conn. How may a young man know whether he has a call to the ministry?

The most conclusive proof is the practical one, that in such efforts as he is making, God is blessing his words and using them to the salvation of souls. There are many opportunities of speaking for Christ in Sunday Schools and missions. These should be used, and if under such addresses conversions take place, there is good reason for believing that the Lord is calling the speaker to his service. Entering the ministry as a profession is a mistake. There should be consecration and a complete surrender of the soul to the work, otherwise it will be a disappointment and failure.

Mrs. R. F. H., Rockville, Conn. What is the estimated total immigration to the United States up to date?

The total immigration from 1789 to 1902 was 21,151,816 estimated. Last year's total was 648,743. Presumably 1903 will show equally high figures, but this cannot be predicted confidently.

L. N., Jersey City, N. J. In reading of the case of Dr. Funk, who is said to have been in communication with the spirit or familiar of the late Dr. Beecher, and to have had a revelation about a "widow's mite," the very existence of which he (Dr. Funk) had forgotten, it seemed to me that the reverend editor had been made the victim of a practical joke. There was nothing to hinder some joke-loving acquaintance, knowing his proneness to dip into the occult, from giving the seance conductors a "pointer" about the mite, which would easily enable them to mystify a credulous and unsuspicious person, such as the good doctor appears to be.

Very likely there has been either collusion or delusion; but beyond what has appeared in public prints, we know nothing of the case. To us it has always seemed incredible that intelligent persons could believe that spirits return to earth for the sole purpose of playing circus pranks and absurd tricks, worthy of a minstrel show or of some sleight-of-hand performer in a country barn.

W. L. M., Washington, D. C. Is "Earl's Housekeeping" a book of instruction in keeping domestic accounts, suitable for the study of young girls, or is it only intended for advanced housekeepers?

It is especially designed with a view to simplifying details, and though its principles are adapted to the requirements of the largest institutions, it is equally suited to the model home of an artisan. It is particularly recommended for the study of young girls, being plainly worded and interspersed with samples and illustrations of the various accounts. Published by John C. Earl, 1223 Bible House. Price 25 cents.

Reader, Gorham, Mass. 1. Please can you tell me of Alexander Mackay, the missionary, his nationality and place of labor? 2. What society sent him out? 3. Had he a family? 4. Is there a written history of his life? 5. Who is Donald Sage Mackay?

1. Alexander M. Mackay was born in Scotland, 1849. In 1876 he went to Victoria Nyanza, Africa, as a missionary. He did excellent work in Uganda and other parts of the Dark Continent. He died of fever at Usambiro in 1890. 2. He went out under the auspices of the Church Missionary Society. 3. No. 4. Yes; you can procure from Revell & Co., N. Y., the book entitled, Mackay of Uganda. 5. A preacher in New York City.

S. M. C., Butte, Mont. 1. What does "Pundit" mean? 2. I see so many Hindu names end with "bar." Can you tell me its significance?

1. Pundita means teacher. 2. The suffix is equivalent to our "mistress" or "miss." It is very convenient in that it may be applied as a title of respect or courtesy, alike to the married or unmarried person of feminine sex. Our own tongue and other European languages need such a word, for there is embarrassment in addressing a lady when one does not know what title to give without first asking her whether she is single or married.

Despairing One, Syracuse, N. Y. I am oppressed by a sense of sin, not only of a general character, but of particular sins, and though I have repented sincerely and asked God for pardon I cannot get peace. Must I regard that as a proof that I am not forgiven?

By no means. You should rather regard it as an evidence of a lack of faith. You must remember that you are not forgiven because of your consciousness of pardon, but because God for Christ's sake has blotted out your sins. God does not break his promise. Those who repent and plead to be forgiven for Christ's sake, at the same time renouncing their sins, are assuredly forgiven, whether they realize the fact or not. If you owed a debt, which you could not pay, and your creditor cancelled that debt, you would not worry about your own consciousness, but would accept his assurance. Put the gloomy thoughts away from you, and, rejoicing in God's promise, go forward, carefully avoiding a repetition of your sins. Assurance will come in time.

Mrs. Lizzie Stone, of DeKalb, Ill., writes that her baby boy has been named "Herald Immanuel Stone." Herald is now six months old, and is a bright little fellow—such a baby as any two parents might be proud of.

M. D., Schuylkill, Pa. A person who, knowing the truth, sins wilfully and from deliberate choice, is in a very much worse condition spiritually, than one who sins through ignorance, or from impulse, or who only yields under strong temptation. But even in such case, we are not to be the judges of the sinner. Divine grace is infinite, and can reach even the hardest heart.

J. C. B., Hobsonville, Oreg., replying to W. J. W., St. John, Kan., writes:

The Bible (Gen. 8: 4) says the ark rested "upon the mountains of Ararat." In his Harmony of the Bible with Science, Dr. Kinns says: "Now the ark could not have rested upon several mountains, for it might float on to a portion of this chain of mountains, and be left there some feet above the ground when the water subsided.

Mrs. C. E. T., Jackson, Mich. A species of boils or tumors, accompanied by fever.

Moses L., Copenhagen, N. Y. Write to Department of Mines and Metallurgy, Cornell University.

S. M. P., Parkman, O. Write for full information, address, etc., to The Woman's Journal, Boston, Mass.

M. F., Osage, Ia. The "c" is silent. All the other letters are pronounced as written, the "c" short, as in "on."

Mrs. E. A. T., Fostoria, O. 1. The son should take out citizen papers; but as he came here under age, it is not necessary that he take out "first papers." 2. The same answer applies.

J. H. Warren, Minneapolis, Minn., replying to A. B., Brooklyn, N. Y. (whose query appeared in a recent issue of The Mail-Bag), writes: "He asks if there ever was a bridge built over Broadway, N. Y. I have in my possession a picture of this bridge."

TOKENS OF ROYAL GRATITUDE

Queen Alexandra, King Christian, and the Dowager Empress of Russia, Send Greeting and Thanks to America

The following cablegram from the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, now on his way home from Finland and Sweden, will be read with appreciation, conveying as it does a special message to all who have aided, even in the smallest degree, in the India famine and orphanage work and the later relief work in the Northland:

COPENHAGEN, April 11.

To-day we were favored with an audience, lasting an hour, with King Christian of Denmark, Queen Alexandra of England, and the Dowager-Empress of Russia. It took place at the Royal Palace.

Queen Alexandra, who was the first to enter, expressed her profound appreciation of the good work done by Americans for India, during and since the famine. She had read and heard of its magnitude with ever-increasing amazement and admiration. She begged that the generous people of America might be assured of England's sincerest gratitude.

The Dowager-Empress of Russia was moved to tears at the recital of our Finland famine experiences. Both Queen and Empress repeatedly expressed the deepest sympathy with the sufferers. The recital of incidents, showing the self-denial practised by many of the poor contributors to the relief fund, evoked many times the expression, "God bless and reward them!"

King Christian, who spoke in German, was very cordial, and said at parting: "Please convey my greetings to the Danes in America, from whom I have received many tokens of continued love and loyalty."

On Friday forenoon, we had the pleasure of an audience with the Crown Prince, and in the evening were entertained at dinner with his family, twenty sitting at table.

PREACHING CHRIST TO OUR STUDENTS IN PARIS

By the COMTESSE DE MONTAIGU

AMONG the most interesting of the religious movements in Paris, are the "Atelier Reunions," presided over by the Rev. Sylvester Beach. This work, which has never made an appeal to the public, goes on unostentatiously and unceasingly among the students in the Quartier Latin. It is supported by half a dozen persons in America, who, having lived in Paris, recognized the utility of such a centre. These generous people, who provide the modest salary of the minister, are members of the Presbyterian Church, as is also their faithful envoy; but they understand the futility of denominational teachings, as there is every variety of religious belief among the art and musical students. There are among them Greek and Roman Catholics, Baptists, Christian Scientists, Theosophists, and Free Thinkers. The greater portion of the art colony are indifferent to spiritual things.

A little retrospective history of the mission may prove interesting. The necessity for some centre, where the American men and women in Paris, for the purpose of study, might assemble, and listen to some form of moral instruction, was conceived by Mr Newell, a son of the Rev. Dr. Newell, of Brooklyn, in 1902. This earnest worker was connected with the McAll mission, and for a time occupied the pulpit of the American church in the Rue de Berri. He took up his residence in the Latin Quarter, and was in close touch with his compatriots who lived on the left bank of the Seine. He gradually gathered together a handful of artists who met in his private apartment. An Episcopal Church was finally organized, under the fostering care of Dr. Morgan of the church in the Avenue de L'Alma, and Mr. Newell became the rector. His new departure changed the nature of the work, and left the field open for a distinctive enterprise. Shortly after Mr. Newell died.

In the year 1895, Dr. Wood, of Germantown, Pa., exchanged pulpits with Dr. Thurber of the Presbyterian church in the Rue de Berri, for six months. He became greatly interested in the moral welfare of the students, and rallying about him a few of the faithful, he reorganized the meetings in an atelier in the Impasse du Maine. Returning to America, he left the work to be continued by the Rev. Wm. M. Paxton, of Philadelphia. Following Dr. Paxton, came in turn the Rev. Mr. Barnes and the Rev. Geo. W. Davis. In 1902 the work devolved upon the Rev. Sylvester W. Beach, an eloquent and efficient minister of the Gospel, who was sent over by the people whose subscriptions made the Atelier Reunions possible. He had obtained a leave of absence from his church, the First Presbyterian of Bridgton, N. J., for six months. After a winter passed in Paris, he became so convinced of the utility of the movement and so identified with its work, that he was loath to abandon it. The attendance gradually increased until it doubled. After his six months' leave had expired, Dr. Beach returned to his parish and begged for a dissolution of the pastoral relation. This was reluctantly accorded, and he resumed his work in Paris last October. He is a graduate of Princeton.

All who have attended the services, which are undenominational, have been pleased with the way in which they are conducted. The meetings are held every Sunday evening, at 49 Boulevard Montparnasse, in the very heart of the Latin Quarter, in the Academie Vitti, one of the most celebrated art schools in Paris, and are largely attended by Americans. The hall is bare, except for a few charcoal sketches — the work of the students. There is a huddle of canvasses with faces turned to the wall, and of palettes spread with fresh paint, while in one corner hang the aprons of the girls, stained with colors and with a suggestion of oil and turpentine — the students feel at home in the familiar smell-scent and are glad to come. There is no richly appointed altar, no pillared aisles, no carven organ. Almost all who attend are artists. The girl straining every nerve in the attainment of an education, has neither time nor money to waste on tripperies. She may slip unobserved into the crowded room, while the masculine student, weary with striving and in his threadbare garments, can listen in some dimly lighted corner.

Some of the people who sing and play at the services enjoy world-wide renown, and include Mr. Charles Clark, America's finest baritone; Miss Playfair, who won the first prize for the violin at the Conservatoire; Mr. Alberto Villasenor, a talented young Mexican, who received the first prize for the piano at the Conservatory of Leipzig: also Mr. and Mrs. Paul Savage, a baritone and soprano well known in America, with a number of other talented performers. After the music, Dr. Beach gives a plain Gospel talk, inculcating the highest standards of Christianity and morality, and calculated to hold the interest of people of thoughtful and imaginative minds. His hearers feel that he is one of themselves—a friend who mingles in their every-day existence, rejoices with them in prosperity and sympathizes with them in adversity. Dr. Beach has become a sort of father-confessor to the students.

Although the Philadelphia friends of the work support the minister, there are many outside expenses, and these are met by voluntary contributions. They include rent, the honorarium to musicians, the simple refreshments provided at the gathering held every second week at Dr. Beach's residence, and similar [illegible] expenses. No public appeal for funds has been made in Paris, and all

DANGEROUS FOLLY

TEXT — Prov. 14: 9: "Fools make a mock at sin"

THERE are times when hints and delicate phraseology are inadequate for useful purpose, and when the kindest and wisest course is to use plain, outspoken characterization, shot forth on arrows of denunciation and excoriation. So, in my text, Solomon says plainly that the man who mocks at sin is a fool. When the human body is slowly but surely being eaten up by a cancer, it is time to use the surgeon's knife. The gangrened limb needs amputation, not balms, or plasters, or poultices, or fragrant ointments. And when men and women with wide open eyes, deliberately place themselves in a position where they may inhale the fetid atmosphere, reeking with the deadly germs of that contagious and fatal plague called sin, it is high time that some one should be bold enough to stigmatize them by an appropriate name. They are not misguided children, who are merely lost in the crooked by-ways of life's journey. They can see the evil results of sin everywhere they go, if they will only look as they are capable of looking. They are not mental weaklings, who have been confined behind the iron bars of a lunatic asylum. They can think, and clearly think, if they will, and do what they ought to do. Such men and women are displaying suicidal folly, and the only appropriate name for them is that which Solomon applies to them; they are fools. Going to destruction by their own choice and volition, mocking at victims who have already been destroyed, heedless of the fate impending over their own heads, they are as foolish as would be a sea-captain, who, in mid-ocean, and in the grip of a hurricane, broke his rudder-chains, threw his chart overboard, and smashed his compass.

Plain Speaking Necessary

When a gigantic sin is working evil to the body politic, and is endangering our national well-being, Solomon's method is demanded. President Roosevelt evidently thought so, when, a short time ago, referring to a common sin, he wrote: "I do not know whether I most pity or despise the foolish and selfish man or woman who does not understand that the only things really worth having in life, are those, the acquirement of which normally means cost and effort. The man or the woman who deliberately avoids marriage, and has a heart so cold as to know no passion, and a brain so shallow and selfish as to dislike having children, is in effect a criminal against the race, and should be an object of contemptuous abhorrence to all healthy people." The same kind of an excoriating warning against sin Hugh Latimer gave when he sent to Henry VIII., his king, the present of a New Testament, with these pungent words written in plain letters upon the fly-leaf: "For this ye know that no unclean person hath any inheritance in the Kingdom of Christ, and of God." The same kind of warning against sin in high places John Knox used to give, when, as Court preacher, he would look down from his pulpit, and denounce the sins of his ruler, until the beautiful Mary, Queen of Scots, would grit her teeth, and turn pale, and clench her tiny fists in paroxysms of rage. Let me show you why the mockers at sin are fools; also why men and women in the daily walks of life should kneel every morning and evening, and ask the Heavenly Father to protect, and guide, and save them from the evil temptations which beset them everywhere they go.

Evil temptations invariably are introduced to their victim in a seemingly harmless way. They seek your companionship at first as friends, and not as enemies. They do not approach you glaring and convulsively working their claws and leap at you, as the man-eating monster might try to get at your throat, when, in all his fury, he is caged in the Zoological Gardens of Calcutta. But temptations come to you at first with the soft fur, and the purring salutation of the little kitten, which might nestle in your lap. They come insidiously, as the cholera germs might reach you, wrapped in the beautiful garment which is sent to you from far-off India. They come with all the fragrance of the poisonous leaf, which brings death to every creature that touches it. Dr. Cuyler once gave a wonderful description of one of the poisonous trees, aptly called the Judas Tree. He said that the blossoms of this tree are of a brilliant red. From far and near, the fatal beauty of those flowers attracts the insects. Yet, "every bee wandering in search of honey, that alights upon the blossoms, imbibes a fatal opiate and drops to the earth. Beneath this enticing tree, the earth is strewn with the victims of its fatal fascination." That fatal plant is a vivid symbol of the way deadly sin first appeals to its victims. Sin, in the beginning, fascinates the eyes, as with the brightest of floral colors. It fascinates the ear, as with the sweetest of harmonies. It soothes the sense of touch, as with the velvety softness of a tiger's paw, while beneath is concealed the sharp claw. It first woos its victim to pillow his head upon the lap of a beautiful Delilah, and while the sinner sleeps, his lips are parted in a smile, as he dreams the happiest of dreams.

Insidious Enemies

"Sin is a sweet poison," once wrote Anthony Burgess. "It tickleth while it stabbeth. The first thing it does is to bewitch, then to put out the eyes, then to take away the sense of feeling." It is when the temptation is concealed and hidden among attractive surroundings, that it has its greatest danger. The mighty furred bruin of the Rocky Mountains is not caught by the steel trap lying unconcealed in the opened pathway. He shambles along; sniffs it; pushes it aside with his paw; moves round it, or leaps over it. But when that trap is concealed under the green grass a short distance from the tempting meat, then the mountain bear has need for fear. No sooner is the great paw placed upon that harmless looking covering, than the steel teeth of that trap spring shut. The massive limb is held in a vise, and the great beast is as helpless as the murderer about to be executed in the prison yard. The wild turkey will not stoop down of his own accord and enter the small aperture of the fatal trap; but after the hunter has scattered along the forest path the many grains of corn, this wild fowl will lower his head and eat, and eat until he is confined within the wire screens, from which he will be taken out to his death. My brother and sister, are you among those whom King Solomon designates as fools? Do you mock at sin merely because it comes around in a harmless way? The mere fact that the highwayman crouches behind the rock, makes his sudden attack the more dangerous. The mere fact that the quicksands look, to the unpracticed eye, as strong as the rock under your feet, makes their invitations to step upon them the more fatal.

Evil temptations should not be derided. They assail a man at his weakest points of character. They do not try to assault his impregnable citadel, or attack him at those points of his nature that are protected by massive walls, so high and thick that the heaviest of battering rams can only make the slightest indentations. But they try to destroy their victims by strategy; by throwing them off their guard; wounding Achilles, not through the breastplate, but in the heel; conquering Alexander the Great, not with the sword, but with the wine-cup; destroying Charles Stewart Parnell, not with a man's gruff voice, but with a woman's gentle arm; making Thomas Cranmer sign his recantation, not by the power of argument, but by the power of fear. It only needs a comparatively light blow between the eyes to stun the most powerful animal which was ever driven into the Chicago slaughter-houses. It only needs one small sinful temptation to appeal to us in the right way, to destroy any man, unless he is upheld by a divine panoply.

Vulnerable Places

Evil temptations always assail their victims at their weakest points. Is there any man foolish enough to think that his character is so perfectly formed that there is no weak point in his moral armor? A constructor who would not try to strengthen his sagging girder is a criminal. Awful was the catastrophe when, a few years ago, a great bridge across the river Seine broke under the feet of the multitudes, merely because one of the iron links snapped. Poor is the general who would not be vigilant about the weakest part of his fortifications. It was after the famous mine was exploded under the earthworks of Petersburg, that the Federal troops were able to drive back Robert E. Lee's forces into Richmond. And can it be that, with all your brain and force and past experience, you do not realize there is some helplessness, some weakness in your nature? Have you never been tempted in the past and overthrown? Can you not realize that you may be tempted again in the future, and overthrown in the same way?

By being aware of, and trying to strengthen our weaknesses, we are able to supplement our strength. A well-known and thrilling story is told, that the engineer of the Holland dykes was one night invited to a party. That afternoon an awful storm arose. As the hour drew near for the festival, the engineer wavered, but at last he said: "No, I will go to the dykes where my duty calls. My services may be needed there." When he arrived upon the dykes, he found that under the ceaseless bombardment of the seas, some of the stones in one place had become loosened, and a little water was beginning to trickle through. That little stream was gradually growing larger. Over the walls the engineer went. He tried to stop that hole, first with stones. Then he took off his coat, and jammed it into the loosened rocks. "More clothes," he shouted, "more clothes!" And he made his men take off their garments, and at last the dykes were saved. Had that water been allowed to trickle on, and had not the weak part of the wall been strengthened, all the dykes would have been swept away, and thousands of men, women and children would have been drowned.

Solomon well said that when a man with his moral weaknesses scoffs at sin, he is a fool. I heard the reformed John Gough, after he had been forty years a teetotaler, say: "Rather than eat a piece of mince pie flavored with brandy, I would cut off my right arm. I would no more touch it, knowing my physical and moral weakness for drink, than I would be willing to touch a lighted match to a keg of gunpowder." It is sometimes more manly to run from sin than it is to fight sin. God gave us two feet as well as two fists. That means there are certain times when we should flee from temptation that we should never allow ourselves to be placed in a position where we may be tempted. Temptation always fiendishly strikes its victim at his weakest point. Therefore, "let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed less he fall."

The Seared Conscience

Evil indulgences should not be derided. They dull the moral sensibilities. Their sinful effects cannot be seen so much in the wasting away of the moral tissues as Bright's disease might wreck the kidneys, or tuberculosis might eat away the lungs. But evil indulgences have a hardening, or a dulling effect, as cirrhosis hardens the liver, or as paresis affects the cell tissues of the brain. It is said that when a man's right side is benumbed through the effect of a paralytic stroke, the doctor can take a pin and drive it into his limb, and the patient is oblivious to the sense of pain. So, when a human being is suffering under the paralyzing effect of sin he loses his moral sensibilities. What appeared to him once as wrong, now appears to be right, and what was once right, now does not appear to have any special significance in his life.

The gradual dulling or the paralyzing of the moral sensibilities by the touch of sin, may be seen in the life of a country boy, who has come to live in our large cities. When that young man left home he was as pure as his sister, or his mother. He had a delicate, spiritual touch. He could distinguish right from wrong as readily as a trained artist's eye can tell the harmony of colors, or a musician's ear can be shocked at the slightest discord. But after awhile, that young man allows himself to be led into questionable enjoyments. When he first saw enchanting sin, a fiery blush mantled his cheek. But after awhile his perceptions are dulled, evil is no longer repulsive to him; he begins to believe that the theatre may have a beneficial influence. He can argue for it with a clear eye and a steady heart-beat. After awhile he can go, and with absolutely no qualms or upbraidings of conscience, can sit and listen to the vilest of talks which are being uttered upon the stage, sit there with a young girl by his side, who is no more ashamed of what she sees and hears than is her masculine escort. The fact that the young man is able to argue with you, and that he sees no wrong in watching a sinful play, proves beyond a doubt that he has cirrhosis of the soul, a hardening of the moral sensibilities, an inability to spiritually distinguish right from wrong. What color-blindness is to the locomotive engineer, who is unable to distinguish warning signals alongside the railroad track, spiritual color-blindness is to the sinful soul. After awhile, by the touch of sin, the sinner loses his capacity to distinguish right from wrong, and, like the eyeless ground-mole, is unable to tell the brightness of midnoon from the darkness of midnight.

Gradual Degradation

I have seen, more than once, this hardening of the moral sensibilities by sin. Within a few blocks of my old Chicago home, there was a sinful place, where most of the victims caught were young boys of fifteen or sixteen years of age. That evil place, thank God, has since been closed. In the windows of that pool-room were hung up a great number of lewd pictures. Again and again, I have seen young men come up to that place for the first time. When they would do it they would stagger back as though stunned. Then they would look around the street, as though they were thieves about to rob a house. Then at those lewd pictures in the windows they would look again, with glassy eye and flushed face. But afterwards, those same boys, who at first were ashamed to look, would become bold-faced and vile-tongued. They would stand around that corner, smoking filthy cigarettes, and insul hat has been given has been done without solicitation. The informal gatherings at the minister's rooms are upplementary features of the main work itself. Mrs. Beach is the doctor's helpmeet, and ably seconds her husband, visiting the sick and comforting the despondent. At these gatherings the rooms are crowded, and he minister and his wife meet all with a warm welcome. To the American student, homesick and heartweary, hese occasions come as an agreeable break in the monotony of existence, and he feels as though a little corner of his native land had been dropped down in the midst of a foreign environment. With scarcely an exception, the guests are the students from the "Quarter," with a sprinkling of others interested in the work.

PREACHING CHRIST TO OUR STUDENTS IN PARIS

One who has never lived in Paris can scarcely realize the benefits arising from these Atelier Reunions. The peculiar conditions among which the students live are responsible for much of their imputed laxity of morals. Few are people of independent means, the majority living off a bare pittance. Men and women lead a Bohemian existence—a hand-to-hand struggle with poverty—many sacrificing everything in order to attain an art education. They occupy small and ill-ventilated rooms, too often devoid of the ordinary comforts. Most of them eat at obscure restaurants, far from tempting. Perhaps, in the whole city of Paris, there is not a door open to welcome them, not a friendly hand to grasp their own, not a kindly soul to whom they may turn for advice or sympathy. The inauguration of the Atelier work has greatly improved their social condition, for they know that they are always welcome at the Sunday reunions or the gatherings at the house of the pastor. The work has done much to draw them away from low resorts. Many of them, coming from the narrow environment of some country village, and away from home and family, are curious to know about that fast Parisian life, which they have heard discussed in whispers. Left to their own resources, a few succumb to these baleful influences; but the majority are serious-minded men and women, who have neither the time nor the inclination for leading irregular lives. Until the establishment of the Atelier work, there was no place in which the student could pass Sunday evening. The brasseries (beer saloons), the cheap theatres and concert halls, the Bal Bullier, and other such places, always offered warmth and amusement to these sojourners in a foreign land, with rest and refreshment, although not of a salutary kind.

It may be asked, why do the American students inhabit the Latin Quarter? There are several reasons. Rents are cheaper, and there are any number of small restaurants where food may be obtained reasonably. Perhaps the most potent attraction is, that most of the celebrated art schools are in this vicinity, and the students naturally group themselves around these institutions.

As a rule, the Americans in Paris are a law-abiding community, and command the respect of the people. The American girl student has improved the moral status of the women in the Latin Quarter, for the French have recognized the fact that she is not to be judged by foreign standards. While the French girl cannot go in the street unattended, the young American student may go and come at any hour of the day and night, without molestation, clothed with the armor of modesty, the most powerful ægis of the virtuous woman. Most of the girl students are faithful attendants at these Atelier Reunions, conducted by the Rev. Dr Beach, where they find relaxation after effort and hard study.

ng young girls as they would pass by. Within the valls of my own church, I have seen this paralyzing of he moral sensibilities by sin. I have seen a man who nce led a noble woman to the marriage altar, not only acrifice himself, but sell his own child into sin, for the gratification of quenching a drunkard's thirst. My brother and sister, with such examples before you of the metamorphosing power of sin, can you afford to run the risk of scoffing at sin? Are you not afraid that, as in Circe's palace, you may be changed into the form of a human brute? Are you not afraid that by the touch of sin, your conscience may become so hardened that you shall have no moral sensibilities left?

Evil temptations should not be derided. The depths of human misery into which they can fling their victims, his side of the grave, are unfathomable. It is upon he dark side of the results of sin I would speak. The rouble with many of our so-called Christian teachers, s that we put a halo over sin. We picture temptation as a creature of beauty, seated upon a silver cloud lined with gold. She holds in one hand a pack of cards, and n the other a goblet of wine. The color of her cheek, he flowers caught in the folds of her garment, clinging about her lithe form, make her look so innocent, one cannot help loving her, even though she may be bad. But I would tear away the beautiful robe, and under the rim of that cloud, I would show you a crouching demon, whose only music is the agonizing cry of those whom he has got in his clutches; whose only joy is in tantalizing those whom he is destroying, and whose frightened, pleading eyes have no more effect upon his stony heart than the cry of the helpless fawn upon the boa constrictor, who is wrapping its coils about the trembling body for the fatal hug.

The first steps to moral destruction may wind through a garden; but that floral pathway soon changes into he hilly road, covered with jagged rocks and running by the side of yawning precipices. The bracelets of gold are soon changed into the handcuffs of steel. The merrymakers will soon hear the echoes of their laughter in the shrieks of the doomed and the lost. There is no permanent happiness in sin. Mark that, my brother—no real happiness in sin.

Tell me, O drunkard, that you are happy? No! No! Anyone who has heard John B. Gough describe the miseries of his past life knows that no drunkard is happy. Tell me that the libertine is happy, when by his crimes he lost the respect of all good men and women? Tell me that the gambler is happy? No! No! When he sat at the gaming table, he not only lost his honor, but his home, his business, his all. He cannot even buy a pair of shoes for his feet, or a coat for his back. Thomas Guthrie once described the cup of sin as a beautiful chalice filled with wine, but at the bottom of the cup lay coiled a serpent. And so, after we have sipped for a little while the cup of pleasure, then the evil serpent will appear and sting us, and bite us as we put the chalice to our lips. Let no man consent to be a mocking fool by supposing that an evil life ever brings happiness this side of the grave.

But how much more awful must be the evil results of sin on the other side of the grave! Can a tiger change his striped fur? Can a wolf have his hair bleached into the white wool of a lamb? Can a man born in sin, reared in sin, and living in sin, and dying in sin, be emancipated from sin, merely because his body sleeps for a little while in the tomb? Oh, no! The soul that sinneth is the soul that must suffer the results of its sins, unless Christ forgives those sins and washes them clean in the Blood of the Lamb. And whenever there is sin—whether in this world or the next—there is agony. I do not care whether you call the place of everlasting punishment a "lake of fire and brimstone," or the haunting caverns of memory. The sinner, dying unrepentant, must suffer, and suffer, and suffer forever. The Bible declares it. We must believe it.

The suicidal folly of the sinner, who, year by year, adds to the long record of his sins, was vividly and impressively compared by Mr. Spurgeon to a blacksmith, who, at the command of an Oriental tyrant, forged for him a long chain. The blacksmith, at his forge, worked week in and week out, month in and month out. Then he brought the chain to the fiend, and said: "Here is the chain which thou didst order." "Make the chain longer," said the tyrant: "longer, make it longer." When at last the blacksmith answered: "I cannot make the chain any longer, for I have used up all my material;" the tyrant said to his slaves: "Take it, and bind the blacksmith with his own chain: and cast him into a furnace of fire." So Satan, as a demon by the power of sin, and by a man's own acts, will not only destroy a man's life for this world, but also for the next.

My brothers and sisters, who have heretofore been mocking at sin, as I have been painting for you a picture, with the dark background of warning, will you not let me paint in the bright foreground a sweet, divine love? Will you not let me describe for you the Christ who is ready to stand between you and all future temptation? The Christ who will not only forgive the past, but by his power will keep you in the future? Who is he? The Unchanging Rock; The Lily of the Valley; The Bright and Morning Star; The One who is altogether lovely; The One who is now standing by your side. Will you receive him?

Ye mockers at sin, I would plead with you also. Come to the fountain of which, if one drink, he shall never thirst again. I would plead as I have never pleaded before. Why? Because I know that under your sneers and laughter you have a breaking heart. I know that you are at heart weary of your sin and dread its punishment. Come, then, and let Christ save you. Do not be kept back by the thought that you are too bad to be saved. You are invited, and Christ assures you that none that come to him shall be cast out.

RAISING THE CROSS IN SOUTH AFRICA

SINCE the return of peace in South Africa, missionary work, temporarily interrupted by the British-Boer war, has made rapid progress. From the letters given below, from four missionary workers in the field, the reader may form an impression of the character and extent of the work now going on in Rhodesia and the Transvaal:

A Native Zulu Evangelist

MT. SILINDA, MELSETTER DISTRICT, RHODESIA, AFRICA, Nov. 3, 1902.

Editor "The Christian Herald":

The check which you sent us to aid in our mission work came duly to hand, and we acknowledge this gift with many thanks. Never has the outlook upon the field been so promising. The educational interests of the mission, within the last few months, have been moving forward by leaps and bounds. At Silinda, where the educational work was first inaugurated in 1893—less than two months after the arrival of the mission on the field—the attendance has steadily increased and the advancement of the pupils has been most satisfactory. At Chikore, which is surrounded by a large population, within easy access to the school, the attendance has risen to more than one hundred. A mission school was opened in April at Melsetter, to meet the educational needs of the children of the colonists. In spite of many difficulties, this school has already become a mighty agency for righteousness in this young and rapidly developing colony.

Of peculiar interest, is the opening of a new out-station at Matangas, between Silinda and Chikore. Here the family of a Zulu evangelist from Natal has been located, and a school has been opened, which, within a month, had an enrollment of forty-one, and is still increasing. This school is taught by Mtisu Dhlakama, a youth who followed the pioneer mission party from his home in the lowlands to the hills. For the last two and a-half years he has been at work in the mines, in order to provide himself with money with which to establish a home. He recently returned, married one of our girls, who has been in school here for some five years, and sought the opportunity to do Christian work under the superintendence of the mission. We engaged him for a few months, hoping that from some unexpected quarter funds would be forthcoming, and that his services might be permanently retained. Sixty dollars is sufficient to support the family of a Christian native teacher for a year. The opportunities for opening schools in the surrounding regions are boundless.

Many Converts at Umtali

UMTALI, RHODESIA.

Dear Editor:—It is marvelous how God is blessing the work here. Nearly every Sunday, someone is saved. Last Sunday evening, six entered into the light. David, a little boy of about ten, was found in the river bed with his little companion, praying.

The church is becoming too small for the people who are coming. It is beautiful to hear the clear, definite testimonies given to God's saving power. In the great majority of cases, they never heard the name of Jesus till they came to this mission. It is blessed to be the first heralds of salvation to these people. They acknowledge that they have no desire to steal and tell lies, as they used to do. Old things have passed away and all things have become new. We have over eighty in our probationers' class, and Mrs. Wodehouse has over one hundred in her night-school—all new converts, eager to learn.

The Rev. David Carson and wife have been transferred from Liberia to this conference, and will be a great help in this rapidly growing work.

William, one of our boys, was converted some months back at one of our meetings. He is a bright lad, and gifted, and his great wish is to become a preacher of the Gospel. He has begun already to exhort and pray in the meetings. We are training him with the ministry in view. Mrs. Carson gives him an hour every day, besides home work. I want your readers to pray for Willie, that God may use him amongst his own people. He is only sixteen years of age.

In the Transvaal "Compounds Mission"

JOHANNESBURG, TRANSVAAL, SOUTH AFRICA, December 15, 1902.

Dear Editor:—I have much pleasure in sending you the hearty and grateful thanks of our evangelist, Sibhalo, who lost all he possessed in our late war. The Boer, for whom he had worked many years, had paid him in cattle and horses, and they had increased, so that he thought himself a rich man. The wife of this Dutch farmer was a Christian. She told the servants about Christ, and of repentance and salvation; but Sibhalo began to drink. The lady warned him, and said, "It is written that no drunkard shall inherit the Kingdom of God." He had a severe illness. One morning he awoke to realize the sad fact that he was blind. Then came home to his soul the words he had heard, and a great desire to know more filled his thoughts. He found a lad to lead him to a mission station. There he gave his heart to God and started for the American Theological Seminary at Adams, Natal, to learn. He found those willing to teach him to recite verses and chapters, for his memory was remarkable, and it was a delight to teach him, because his comments taught his tutors to understand the verses even better than before. When he finished the course, he was set apart as an evangelist. He is called to conduct revival meetings. I have attended several of these meetings. I have heard many speak of the good he had done to their souls.

Some of Sibhalo's sayings are quaint and suggestive. "A big potful of beer fills some people's hearts, and there is no place for Christ to enter in to save them," he says. "I know a girl whose shawl filled her heart, and there was no place for the Saviour to enter in." "I saw a girl weeping. She said she was the one whose love of clothes had kept Christ out." In this way he kept on, until he seemed to hit the consciences of all who had not yet yielded their hearts to the Saviour.

The native school-teacher at Icwadi writes to tell me of a very blessed work attending the meetings held there by Sibhalo, lately. Many rose to confess their faith in Christ. To him I sent THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S check. Two of our Christian workers said, "You could not do better with the money, than to help Sibhalo. He is a very good man and an earnest evangelist." He has no salary, but the people give as they feel that he deserves help.

Mr. Goodenough is the missionary of the A.B.C.F.M. in Johannesburg, and superintends the work of four evangelists, preaching in the Compounds. The work is interesting here. Crowds of natives from the interior come here to work in the mines. I have met travelers from the interior who told us that they had come upon little schools, taught by young men who had learned to read in these mission schools in Johannesburg, and from their books that they had carried home, they were teaching others to read.

I had a pleasant surprise here lately. I was speaking to a crowd of young native men, when one looked at me as if he recognized me, so I asked him where he came from. He replied, "Emzinyati; very near Inanda, my home. Do you remember," he added, "when you met me, about praying and telling me about the King in Heaven? I have been praying every day since, and I am now a Christian."

Would you believe it! There has risen a native Zulu preaching that he is the Christ!

A 700-Mile Missionary Ride

SWEDISH INDEPENDENT BAPTIST MISSION, GREENWICH, SOUTH AFRICA.

Dear Editor:—It is now two years since I first had the joy of reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It has become "a friend of mine," and I receive it with pleasure as it appears week by week, bringing tidings from all over the earth. The loneliness and desolation of heathenism around us seems to pass away when reading its pages, and one is brought in contact with the civilized world, and the "hustle and bustle" of it, as he reads THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mrs. Anderson and I, together with two native boys, went on a journey a few months ago, preaching the Gospel and exploring the country. Our little wagonette, drawn by five donkeys, was for two months our home, during which time we covered 700 miles. The wagonette was our drawing-room, sitting-room and bedroom (and in wet weather, also kitchen and dining-room). In some districts, the native women and children had never before seen a European lady. They flocked around the wagonette, and all Mrs. Anderson's actions and movements were watched and commented upon. "See how confidently she speaks to him—and she laughs also," they would say. Then we would stop, and ask them to sit down on the grass while we told them of the love of Christ and how he came to save sinners.

About 200 miles of our route went through a district where the recent war had been raging, and had left its mark of destruction and desolation.

FINLAND'S OWN STORY OF THE FAMINE

A SNOW-BOUND COTTAGE NEAR UTOJARVI, IN THE HEART OF THE FAMINE PROVINCES OF FINLAND

In this issue, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD presents a very remarkable series of photographs, direct from the famine field. These photographs were procured through the courtesy of Herr Castren, Burgomaster of Uleaborg, and involved a long and arduous journey of nearly one hundred miles on the part of the photographer, F. Suomalan, in bleak, arctic weather. They show more eloquently than words can express, the forlorn condition of the people. Fortunately, the acute stage of the famine is now over.

THIS touching story of the famine in Northern Finland, prepared for this journal by the direction of the Burgomaster of Uleaborg, is one that will interest every reader. It comes from one who has thorough knowledge of the situation. The patient, uncomplaining, Christian spirit of the Finns in deep tribulation is probably without a parallel in the world.

"No clearer idea of the condition of the Finnish people at the present time can be presented than that described in the words of the Psalmist. 'For I am made to suffer, and my agony is continually before me' (Ps. 38:18). These words the history of the Finnish race is now verifying on every page of its annals, which tell of incessant sufferings caused by wars, famines and plagues. Through these sufferings and trials, the Finns have become inured to hardships. These acts of God have put their stamp on the national character, so that it is undoubtedly true what a great Finnish poet (Z. Topelius) says: 'If the Finnish people were as energetic in their actions as heroical in their sufferings, there would not be their equal in the whole world.'

"Although those inspired words of the poet may be to some degree exaggerated, the essential point remains, that the Finnish people have heroically borne their afflictions. They have neither trumpeted out their cares, nor lamented their sufferings to the world. God alone knows them.'

"Dark clouds are gathering over Finland at present. During the last four years, the old state of things has been changing. And now the famine is grinning at the doors of the poor living in the northern deserts of our land. On account of the peculiar condition of things, large commercial and industrial transactions are at an ebb. Uncertainty reigns everywhere. If the people did not know that 'although the Lord tries, he will never reject the people that put their trust in him,' they soon would perish in despair. It is truly wonderful to see the patience and humility with which this people bear their sufferings. The spark of hope is still glowing in their hearts, although external appearances look so dark and dismal.

"A vivid picture is given by those who have visited the famine-stricken provinces, of which we will borrow this description, given by Dr. K. Relander, of the parish of Sotkamo:

"'Entering a cottage, I observed on the bench by the fire three pale and emaciated small children, warming their cold, shivering bodies. Close to the fire sat the haggard-looking mother, holding a little skeleton-looking baby of seven months, and trying to give it nourishment from her empty breasts. When I stepped in, the mother exclaimed: 'Oh, Lord, my God, hast thou sent here thy angel and heard my prayers, when I cannot go anywhere, and these poor children are crying for food?' I answered: 'I am not an angel, but I am sent to show that the Lord is hearing those that pray to him with the humility of their hearts and trust in him.'

"'Five cakes of poor-looking bread were all the provisions in the house. There was only about a teaspoonful of salt. For a long time they had had no other food—only poor, black bread, with a small allowance of salt. 'Oh!' exclaimed the mother, 'if we only had once a week a proper meal, I would be better fit to nourish this poor baby.'

"The doctor gave of his own provisions to the hungry family, and afterwards sent them smoke and humidity, so that you cannot properly see anything else but small beings crawling around your feet, trying to escape to a corner. Having satisfied the inmates, I sat down to the last cake. The pale, thin worings of the house is just taking out from the oven some cakes that look black and yellow, but she doesn't speak a word. She stares at me with wondering eyes. As I ask her about her home, she bursts out crying and goes in a corner to sit down. She puts her torn apron over her eyes, and continues weeping, without uttering a word.

"'The situation began to be painful, so I turned to other but as I could do none anything. At last my spoke by going on to speak. But soon she had been feeding them half of it was put back on the plate, pointed to smoking it more to lessen the bitter taste, after which it was eaten with great avidity. This woman had seven children, the youngest one at the breast, so that she could not leave her home to beg alms. The children were emaciated and half naked. Her husband had worked to get some meal that was to be mixed with the bark, but as his work was finished. Then had no more.'

"To help the sufferers in the Uleaborg district, energetic measures have been taken. Besides large sums collected, and a lot of provisions and clothing distributed among the sufferers, children's homes have been founded at several places where the destitute children, besides tuition, are fed and clothed.

"Such are the general features of the present situation. The hand of God rests heavily on the people of Suomi; but if we humiliate ourselves, he will, in his time, help us.

"Receive our most hearty thanks for the high-minded and ample help rendered through the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. You may be assured that in our land there will rise from many thankful hearts prayers and devout aspirations, that God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, may bless you with all spiritual blessings."

All contributions to the Northland famine will be acknowledged in these columns, and will be duly called to the authorized committees in Helsingfors and Stockholm.

Popular Orthodoxy

A DISPATCH from San Francisco announces the resignation of a well-known clergyman, of his position as preacher of the Memorial Church of Stanford University. The cause is not fully explained, but it is said to have arisen out of the severe criticism of his efforts to discover and establish "the common denominator of religions." This is a curious phrase, but we infer that it implies a belief that all religions have a common basis and do not differ radically one from another. Almost simultaneously with the publication of this dispatch, appears a statement issued by a religious association, disclaiming responsibility for an utterance by another clergyman which he made in a Lenten talk in Philadelphia, under the auspices of the association. Some time ago a Congregational Council was called on to repudiate the utterances of a prominent congregational minister in his pulpit in Brooklyn, or at the least, to declare that the statements he had made must not be regarded as representing the beliefs of his brother ministers. All these preachers are so eminent and conspicuous, that these actions in regard to them have unusual significance. They belong practically to the same school and hold to a considerable extent the same views of Christianity.

The natural inference from these actions is that the views expressed, in spite of the learning and ability of the preachers, do not find favor among the people. The fact will be recognized with satisfaction by all orthodox Christians. It shows that there is abroad a deep, strong love of the old Gospel, which cannot be undermined by the "new thought." It is not surprising that men whose hearts have been filled with the peace which passes understanding as the result of believing in Christ as the only begotten Son of God, by whose blood atonement has been made for them, should hold fast their faith and refuse to accept in its stead the nebulous, abstruse doctrines of the new school. They have a profound conviction that however beautiful and noble other religions may be, however much truth they may contain, they lack the saving power that Christianity possesses. Of none of them can it be said, as of the old Gospel, that "it is the power of God unto salvation." Like the blind man in the Gospel, they refuse to be entangled in disputes about the origin of doctrines, or in questions of philology, and plant themselves squarely on the experience, "One thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I see."

Very reassuring must this fact be to some who have been apprehensive of the future of the Church. It shows that the heart of the rank and file of the Church beats true, and that its mind is too clear to accept the husks and chaff of modern thought in place of the verities of the faith. The old Gospel has lost none of its power, and it will continue to win its trophies, even though some have left its simplicity for more cultured and refined, but less vigorous doctrines.

The Problem of the Children

WHEN President Roosevelt, in his recent letter to a New York author, discussed with his customary frankness the problem of "race suicide," he awoke the American people to the consideration of a subject, which, till then, had rarely found its way into the public prints. It has now become almost a national theme. In response to our request in a recent issue, for an expression of opinion on the part of our readers, a very large number of letters have been received, some of which appear elsewhere in this issue. These will be found most interesting reading.

This is a question, however, upon which human society has never been agreed. Since the days of Malthus, and probably long before, it has arisen at intervals, to be discussed indecisively and set aside for the time, only to be revived again and again. Wholly apart from the moral aspect of the problem, it is evident that it can be viewed simultaneously from a variety of standpoints, dependent upon many circumstances, and qualified by social, industrial and domestic conditions. Any one who visits the congested tenement districts in our great cities, will easily find material for argument against large families, for the plight of those thousands of neglected, ill-fed, ill-clothed and uneducated little ones is enough to move the stoniest heart to pity. But it is the condition of society, and not the children, that needs reforming. Their plight is the result of abnormal conditions, which the individual and the community should constantly strive to improve. Under a better state of things, the large families of the very poor would no longer be regarded as a menace or a burden, but a blessing to the home, the State, and the nation.

There is, perhaps, no more beautiful or inspiring picture in the world than that drawn by the sacred writer who describes the children of the righteous as "an heritage of the Lord. . . . Happy is the man that hath his quiver full of them;" "thy children (are) like olive plants around thy table;" and again, "children's children are the crown of old men." Nor can we forget that the Saviour himself loved the little ones, and specially blessed them, and held them up to his disciples as a type of the Kingdom. We cannot agree with that cold-blooded philosophy which holds that, as the race advances mentally and spiritually, the love of offspring will decline, and that, in the coming millennial era, the question of race reproduction, as a problem, will have disappeared. Not in any earthly state, but in the heavenly alone, will there be "neither marrying nor giving in marriage." And even in that blessed land, where worldly questions never enter, the little children, neglected, despised, abused on earth, have special honor, for "their angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven," said Jesus. It is not his will that one of them should perish, either here or hereafter.

We See According as We Are

THE eye sees what it brings with it to see. The saying, "Tell me what you think of other people, and I will tell you what I ought to think of you," is the only way of saying that a man's view of the world is necessarily determined by his own character.

Some time ago, an artist was employed to reproduce the portrait of a poet, not more distinguished for his genius than for his devotion to the highest moral and spiritual ideals. When the artist had finished his work, the reproduction at first seemed perfect. The two portraits were put side by side for study; every detail of one was reproduced in the other, yet something was felt to be wanting. The new picture was unsatisfactory. It lacked inspiration. One day, the owner of the two pictures showed them to a friend, who unwittingly supplied the solution. Well knowing the artist who had made the copy, incidents in his life were related, showing most conclusively his inability to appreciate the incorruptible purity of the poet, whose face he had attempted to portray. His own character was written in negatives on the picture he had failed in making.

Take a man or a boy who always suspects others of doing deceitful things, and you may be pretty sure there is some doubleness in his own life. Or hear a man crying out against the ingratitude of the world, and it is more than likely that he has not done much to call for gratitude. And so it is usually not the best people in the world who are loudest and cruellest in their indignation against sinners; it is rather those who are deeply, secretly, sinning themselves. It is the penalty of sin to suspect sin in others.

On the other hand, it is the reward of goodness to believe and know that others, too, are good. How fine and fitting the words which Shakespeare puts in the mouth of Brutus:

> My heart doth joy, that yet, in all my life,
> I found no man but he was true to me.

How fitting—for Brutus was "the noblest Roman of them all," and it was his own nobleness that made others seem noble to him.

Progress Heavenward

YOU have watched the beautiful motions of the sea birds following a ship—now floating on the wind with no apparent exertion, now flapping their wings in upward flight, now dropping to catch from the crest of a wave a morsel of food thrown from the ship, now outstripping the wind to recover the distance lost, now wheeling with graceful curve to right and left, and ever crossing and recrossing one another as if in joyou dance. Watching them, one forgets that they have an other motion. Yet all the while they are traveling o ward, twenty knots an hour. Those various motion among themselves do not suspend at all their stead flight across the deep.

God means that we shall have life's movemen among ourselves. That is the truest, most beautif Christian life, in man or woman, which, diligent i whatever station Providence may have assigned, wit cares of business, cares of children, cares of socie cares of friendship, is yet amidst all making stead progress heavenward; now stooping for food, no soaring in thankfulness, now sweeping hither an thither in the exercise of God-given faculties, and eve with friendly heart mingling in beautiful harmony wit the kindred flight of others; yet in every one of thes motions regulated by the purpose of an all-controllin flight onward, ever onward, to the desired haven.

Suffering, the Gateway of Glory

THERE is no other entrance into glory, the glory o any victory—victory over the low, the false an the evil, over self-hood or Satan-hood—but the gatewa of suffering. The history of our country, from Valle Forge and the Brandywine to the Rappahannock and th death-bed of martyred presidents, proclaims the truth Even the banner of the Republic, which is loved an reverenced through all the world as the bringer of fre communion between nation and nation, the bringer o order and equal justice and holy freedom, and the divin majesty of law and the light of the blessed Gospe wherever it goes—is not that flag a beautiful and dee sign to us, almost an ordinance of God, that, whethe for nations or for men, stripes are first, blood-red, pe chance, and only afterward and through them, the star of peace and glory?

He who will not suffer for principle has no prin ciple. He who will not suffer for love—love of man love of country, love of God—does not know wha love is. To sink self, to bury self—that is greatness that is glory. When the monitor Tecumseh, on tha August morning in Mobile Bay, was running the Con federate forts, she was rent by a torpedo and wen down in a few moments. It was then, says the histo rian, that her commander, Craven, did one of thos deeds that should always be linked with the doer' name, as Sydney's is with the cup of cold water. Th pilot and he at the same instant instinctively made fo the narrow opening leading to the turret. Craven drew back. "After you, pilot," he said. There was no after ward for him; the pilot was saved, but the commande went down with the ship. There was a lineal descend ant of the knighthood of old, and the true type of th hero for all time to come.

The Ladder of Prayer

THE blessed commerce between heaven and earth begins in heaven: God sends his promise down Then follows prayer—man sends up his request base upon the promise. Then comes the second downward motion, which is the answer to prayer in blessing. And finally, the reflection upward, in thankful surrender, and service to that love which came down on us in respons to our call.

It is like the letter W: the first stroke is downward the promise from above; the second is upward, th prayer from below; the third is downward, the answe from God; the fourth and last is upward, the offering of grateful love from man.

Remember, it takes four strokes to make a W: leav out one of them and see how it looks! So, likewise these four things—promise, prayer, answer, praise, mak one perfect and blessed whole. Prayer is nothing til promise has been given; and answer is certain if praye is true; and praise must follow if the gracious exercis is to be complete.

Balkan Disturbances

NEW difficulties have developed in the dominions of the Sultan. The steps he has taken toward executing the reforms demanded from him by Austria and Russia have exasperated the Albanians, who occupy the region on the west of Macedonia, which is ancient Epirus. From this district the Sultan obtains his bravest soldiers, and so thoroughly does he trust them that he employs them as his bodyguard. They are indignant with him for yielding to the two Powers, and declare that if he will supply them with a million rifles they will soon rid him of his enemies. He is thus placed in the disagreeable dilemma of being threatened with destruction by the Powers if he does not grant reforms, and of being deserted by his trusted Albanians if he does grant them. There is reason to believe that at heart the Macedonians are as much opposed to reform as the Albanians. It is not reform that they want, but independence. They would prefer that the Sultan should commit such outrages that the European Powers would unite to wrest Macedonia from his hands and make it autonomous, as they did Bulgaria. To this end, they are provoking attack by pillage, rapine and murder, in the hope of exciting the Turkish troops to barbarities. They are led by Boris Sarafoff, who is the man popularly believed to have planned and directed the seizure of Miss Stone, the American missionary, who was ransomed by this country. The Albanians, on their side, are guilty of excesses. They recently attacked the town of Mitrovitza, roughly expelling the foreign officers, whom the Sultan, at the mandate of the Powers, had appointed. They fiercely attacked the Russian Consulate, inflicting wounds on the Consul, from which he has died, thereby arousing the hostility of Russia. It would appear that the Sultan has need to pray for deliverance from his friends, as well as from his enemies. His position is so difficult and so dangerous, that he would be pitied, were it not that people remember his fiendish cruelties in Armenia, and care not how he may suffer, nor do other Governments interpose to relieve him of embarrassment.

Sentenced to Kiss the Flag

A despatch to the New York Times from Boston, Mass., describes an unusual scene which was enacted on the United States revenue cutter Seminole, lying in that harbor, one day recently. One of the seamen, of foreign nationality, broke out in the forecastle one day in violent abuse of pretty nearly everything. He proceeded in his vituperation without being molested until he called the United States flag a dirty rag and indulged in other unpatriotic sentiments. A Quartermaster standing near reported this language to Capt. Rogers, commanding the Seminole, and the latter took prompt action. All hands were called to general muster, and when they were lined up the captain addressed them on the enormity of the offense committed by one of their number. Then he compelled the culprit to kiss the flag six times, and to repeat after him an obligation never to speak disrespectfully of it or to allow any one else to do so in his presence. The culprit's sentence was probably lighter than it would have been if it had been left to the other seamen, and as it may be if the offence is repeated when there is no wise, forbearing officer around to restrain wrath. Christians who hear their Lord derided are often tempted to inflict punishment, but it is even in those cases unwise. Christ will eventually vindicate his own name.

Kiss the Son, lest he be angry and ye perish from the way, when his wrath is kindled (Ps. 2: 12).

Virginian Heroines

A beautiful story of devotion to humanity comes from Richmond County, Virginia. A Northerner settled there some time ago. Recently he was attacked by smallpox and died. His wife, who had tenderly nursed him through his illness, was stricken and then her child, and finally a woman who had been helping her in her household affairs. The three sufferers lay there in their misery, no one daring to go near them. Dr. Fisher, who had charge of the case, sought vainly for some one to nurse them. He mentioned his quest at home and there was a prompt response. His two daughters volunteered to undertake the task. He told them, as was his duty, of the danger they incurred, but they did not shrink from it. They went to the house from which all others fled in terror, and attended to the patients. In spite of their care and attention, the child died, but the other two patients are recovering. The young ladies did not limit their good offices to the living, but when no one could be found to bury the child they took charge of the little body and even helped their father to dig a grave for it, and one of them read the burial service when it was committed to the grave. Such noble conduct deserves special honor, and we may be sure that even if it does not win it from men, it does not miss the approval of heaven.

Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, to visit the fatherless and the widow in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world (James 1: 27).

A Flood-tide of Immigration

All previous records of foreign immigration to these shores were eclipsed on Friday, April 10, when an army of 10,226 aliens arrived from European ports, between sunrise and sunset. They came on a fleet of ocean steamships, and represented many nationalities—Italians, Greeks, Arabians, Turks, Poles, Slavs, Germans, British, and Scandinavians. In language, costume, and appearance they were picturesquely varied, and they crowded Ellis Island, packed the railroad ticket offices, and loaded the westward bound trains, eagerly struggling to reach their many different destinations as quickly as possible. The Scandinavians were chiefly bound for Minnesota and South Dakota, the Germans for the North and West, some of the Poles and Jews for Pennsylvania, while the Italians and Asiatics, with a fair proportion of the Polanders, expected to stay in New York. Within the last decade, New York has achieved the unique distinction of being the most cosmopolitan city in the world. It is also the greatest Jewish city of modern times, and according to the best Hebrew authorities, it contains "more Jews than have been together at any one time and place since the destruction of Jerusalem." This great body of Russian, Galician, Roumanian, Hungarian, Spanish, German and English Jews, is massed chiefly on the East Side of New York. They represent every degree of ignorance and intelligence, of wealth and poverty, and they talk many different languages; yet they cling together with the tenacious cohesion that has always characterized the Jews, and which is probably the outgrowth of long continued conditions of persecution, which compelled them to unite for mutual protection. They have been persecuted and harassed in all lands, and have found in bitter suffering how true was the prophet's warning:

My God will cast them away because they did not hearken unto him, and they shall be wanderers among the nations (Hosea 9: 17).

Fighting Consumption

Prussian statistics, just published, show that the new method of treating consumption under the guidance of Prof. Koch, have been successful beyond the most sanguine hopes, and that if the progress is continued at the present rate the disease will almost disappear in Germany before the end of the first quarter of the century. An American journal, commenting on the figures, points out that the first disappointment that came after Dr. Koch's discovery was really a blessing, because it turned public attention from remedies to prevention. "If the expectations first raised by the discovery had been realized, the social and moral origins of the malady would have been neglected, while now they are receiving careful attention, with the best of results in many ways besides the prevention of consumption. Evil and sickness," it says, "are often the same, or at least so intimately connected that one cannot be eliminated from human life without the other. The most striking proof of this now comes out in the fact that Koch himself admits and even preaches that the great decrease in the death rate from tuberculosis has been due, and will still be due, to sanitary and social betterment. The conditions that breed and scatter physical contagion are precisely those that degrade and morbidize the soul and character." Thus medical and sanitary science confirm the dictum of the wise king:

As righteousness tendeth to life, so he that pursueth evil pursueth it to his own death (Prov. 11: 19).

BRIEF NOTES

Rev. Wm. H. Milburn, the blind Chaplain of the United States Senate, died on April 15. He had been in feeble health for some time, and had gone to Santa Barbara, Cal., in the hope of delaying longer from the climate. He was in his eighty-sixth year. He was elected chaplain of the Senate in 1857, and re-elected in 1861.

Dr. T. J. Barnardo, whose work among the street waifs qualifies him to speak with authority, says: "I am strongly of the opinion that there is no difference between a good boy and a bad one, no matter how descended or how surrounded, when they are taken out of London or at least separated under favorable conditions from the influences exerted between boyhood and manhood. I have long judged that, all other things being equal, environment is the determining factor of the two. No one is more forcibly impressed with this than myself."

A movement has been organized in Chicago with the [illegible] cooperation of Bishop Fallows, Dr. A. D. [illegible] and several other well-known clergymen, to put in circulation [illegible] which a passage of Scripture is printed. The selection is being made by the cars for advertising and carrying the [illegible] tracts from God's Word [illegible] to pass the time [illegible] to some one traveling on the cars. TRAGEDIES OF THE TONGUE ❋ Paul Arrested

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR MAY 3 ACTS 21: 30-39

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

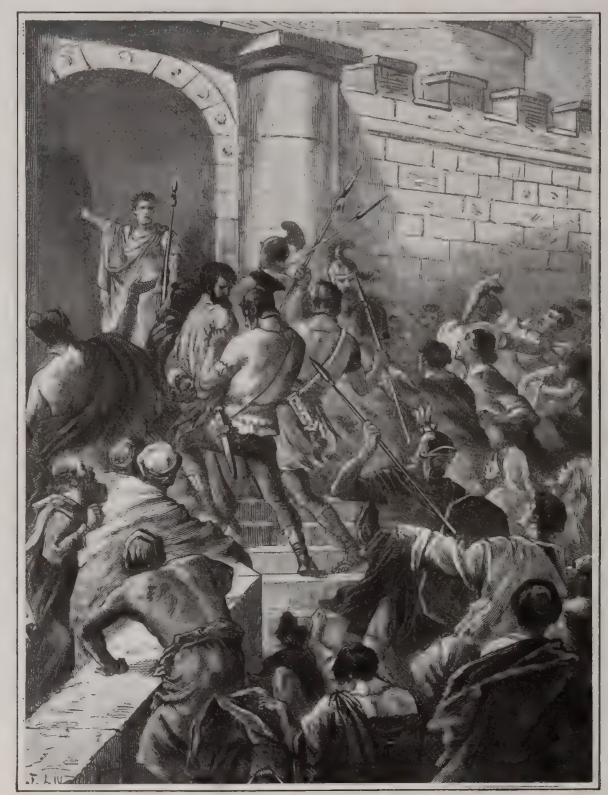
GOLDEN TEXT—I. PETER 4: 16: "IF ANY MAN SUFFER AS A CHRISTIAN, LET HIM NOT BE ASHAMED"

IF James, the brother of our Lord Jesus Christ, the head of the church at Jerusalem, had told the story of Paul's arrest, it would probably have been after this style:

"About seven years had elapsed since Paul had come with Barnabas and others from Antioch, to have the question considered in a Council, as to whether or not the Gentiles must be circumcised in order to become members of the Christian Church. It was decided that while Jewish Christians should continue this rite, it should not be forced upon the Gentile converts. Previous to that occasion, we had been much disturbed by reports that Paul in his preaching in Asia Minor, Macedonia and Greece, had set at naught the law of Moses. But Paul's testimony at the Council fully assured us that such was not the case; and his plans of work received our unqualified commendation. Still there were murmurings against Paul, even from Jewish Christians, mostly in distant places, which reached us at the time of the Feasts, when throngs of Jewish pilgrims, Christians and non-Christians came together in Jerusalem. The non-Christian Jews, who came from Ephesus, at the time of our story, were especially virulent, and fomented opposition to Paul. It seemed to me wise that Paul should disarm this opposition by the performance of some Jewish rite, and I was glad when I found that it had been his purpose to fulfil the Nazarite vow. I had knowledge of four men with limited means, who had come to Jerusalem for a similar purpose, and I suggested to Paul that he join himself to them and pay their charges, which kindness would help much to correct wrong impressions, and stop slandering tongues. This he consented to do. He went with the four men into that part of the Temple devoted to the Nazarites, a small compartment in the southeastern corner of the Court of the Women. There he had to stay for a week and pay for sixteen sacrificial animals, beside four for himself.

"It was while Paul was thus in the very act of keeping the law that he was charged with having violated it, by bringing a Greek within the sacred enclosure of the Temple. Trophimus was not with Paul when this charge was made, but he had been repeatedly seen with Paul in the streets of Jerusalem, and perhaps in the court of the Gentiles. Paul was dragged out through the Gate Beautiful, which was immediately closed by order of the priests to prevent pollution of the Temple by murder. They were less solicitous about murder than about ceremonials. I was not there myself, but every detail was given me by an eyewitness. It seemed as if Paul must be torn limb from limb by the infuriated mob, and doubtless he would have been but for the timely arrival of the Roman soldiers under the command of Captain Claudius Lysias. These soldiers came by an underground passage from the Castle Antonia, which was located at the northwest corner of the court of the Gentiles. At their appearance, those who were beating Paul stopped. The chief captain himself lifted Paul, and then bound him with chains to two soldiers, who supported him on either side, the whole company of soldiers escorting him to the castle, the crowd following, but not attempting violence.

"There were two flights of stairs leading to the castle, and when Paul and his guard had reached the second flight, and were about to enter the castle, Paul appealed to Captain Lysias, asking permission to speak to the people. The captain was surprised by Paul's cultured words, for he had taken him to be an outlaw. Permission was given Paul to speak. It was surpassing strange that he had strength for speaking after the terrible beating he had received. But standing there on the castle stairs, he motioned, after the manner of orators, that he had something to say, and expected quiet attention. He had no charges to bring against the mob for their abuse, but began by addressing them as, 'Men, brethren and fathers.' And then he told them of his past life, how he had once been a persecutor himself, until the Lord Jesus had spoken to him out of the opened heavens and shown him that he was following an evil way. And Paul told the people how he had then given up the persecution of Christians, and himself become one of them. And he told how he had been commissioned by the Lord himself to preach the Gospel to the Gentiles. At this the people became angry again, and they showed by tearing their clothes and by other signs that it was their wish to beat Paul again and take his life. By the command of Captain Lysias, the soldiers took Paul into the castle that he might be safe until such a time as he might be brought up for trial. When news of what had happened to Paul came to us, we gathered the church to pray for his safety and release."



"HE WAS BORNE OF THE SOLDIERS FOR THE VIOLENCE OF THE PEOPLE"

Illustration and Application

In Paul's life, as a whole, we see the blessing and the bane that may lie in words. What blessings to the ages have come from his words, that have been wafted like seeds to all lands, to grow up in noble deeds! On the other hand, he illustrates the truth that the bravest and most unselfish cannot expect to be exempt from his "thorn in the flesh," the malicious tongue. He may have had some other "thorn" also, but surely there were few things he suffered from so much as from evil speaking, prompted by hatred in his foes, and by prejudice among those who, as Christians, should have been his friends. In this lesson, hatred and prejudice were guilty of the same lie, namely, the charge that Paul had set aside the ceremonial law of Moses in proclaiming the Gospel of Christ by which it was fulfilled. There was, as usual, "two grains of truth in the bushel of chaff." He had taught that the ceremonial candles of the morning twilight of prophecy were no longer essential when the Sun had risen, and so the Gentiles could not be required to be Jews in order to be Christians; but he had also, by word and example, taught Christian Jews to continue the observance of Jewish ceremonies, if only to avoid useless controversy, and was engaged in such ceremonies at the very moment he was mobbed for neglecting them. Such absurd misunderstandings and misrepresentations do good men suffer from in every age. It is greatly to be hoped that the most needed warning against sins of the tongue, which this lesson affords, may be so presented that the young people of our Sunday Schools may be saved from the sins and sorrows of slander.

Paul began to suffer from the false tongue at the very beginning of his Christian life. When the revelation of Christ at the gate of Damascus had conquered and converted him, God called to his help one Ananias, not the liar, but one whose tongue was otherwise at fault, for he said, even to God, "I have heard from many of this man how much evil he hath done." "I have heard," was then a false witness, and "I have heard," is making as false judgments every day. You have "heard" of the sins, but not of the repentance. "Behold he prayeth." Let the past tenses go, if the present is right. Who of the great Bible characters was not misunderstood or misreported? Jeremiah, who loved his country so deeply that he sought to purge it of its deadly sins, got only slander and persecution in return (Jer. 9: 3, 5, 8). When Nehemiah was rebuilding Jerusalem, envious men said to him (afterwards they made the same charge to the king): "It is reported among the heathen, and Gashmu saith it, that thou and the Jews think to rebel." Who was Gashmu? The name seems to be the original of our "Mrs. Grundy." In any case, Gashmu lied. Envy cannot see straight and inevitably talks crooked. How David suffered from lying lips his Psalms show. Even Christ was grievously lied about. He said to those who were ever plotting against the Roman government, "Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's," but those very rebels accused him of plotting to be the earthly king they had vainly asked him to be, and got him crucified on that charge. The death of Christ and Paul on false charges are but two of many tragedies of the false tongue (Prov. 18: 21).

What is it Like in Nature?

The evil tongue is repeatedly compared, in Scripture, to a scourge (Job 5: 21) and to a devouring fire (Isa. 30: 27; Jas. 3: 6). It is also, with equal aptness, compared to a serpent (Psa. 140: 3). On the other hand, the tongue that is used for kindly words is said to have honey and milk concealed below it (Cant. 4: 11). It is also pictured as a tree of life (Prov. 15: 4). Some one has said well: "A slander is like a hornet. If you can't kill it the first blow, you had better not strike at it." Our sentiments, our thoughts, our words, lose their rectitude on entering certain minds, just as sticks plunged in the water look bent.

I heedlessly opened the cage
And suffered my bird to go free;
And, though I besought it with tears to return,
It never came back to me.
It nests in the wildwood, and heeds not my call,
Oh the bird once at liberty, who can enthrall?

I hastily opened my lips,
And uttered a word of disdain
That wounded a friend, and forever estranged
A heart I could die to regain.
But the bird once at liberty, who can enthrall?
And the word that's once spoken, O who can recall? VIRGINIA B. HARRISON.

One who has formed the habit of censorious criticism sometimes goes so far as to criticize God. One October day, a passenger on a Hudson River boat called the attention of an English traveler to the tints of the autumnal forests, that seemed like a confluence of fallen rainbows. "Is it not beautiful?" The reply was, "Well, yes; but don't you think it is a little tawdry?" A colored brother in a slab meeting-house, prayed, "O Lord, bless our preacher, and give him a pennyroyal tongue." Pennyroyal is an herb growing abundantly in that region, and is used for ointments and salves. It is healing, soothes irritation, heals old hurts, reduces inflammations.

What is it Like in Common Life?

The evil tongue is compared, in the Bible, to a sword (Psa. 57: 4; 64: 3), and to a razor (Psa. 52: 2); also to a bow, bent to do harm, and to an arrow shot out (Jer. 9: 3-8). But the strongest figure of all is where it is compared to a wild colt that cannot be bridled or tamed (James 1: 26; 3: 8). A bomb in the hands of an anarchist is a terrible weapon, but the tongue of a scandal-monger is an instrument of more tremendous power.

What is slander? A verdict of "guilty" pronounced in the absence of the accused, with closed doors, without defense or appeal, by an interested and prejudiced judge. And what is gossip? The babyhood of slander. "For every idle word that men shall speak they shall give account in the day of judgment."

Will Carleton, in a passage we have before quoted from the story of a home broken by one thoughtless outburst of unkind words spoken by the husband to his wife, contrasts words with kites, a timely illustration for this season:

Boys flying kites call in their white-winged birds;
You can't do that way when you're flying words.

Mrs. Margaret E. Sangster writes in a similar vein:

If I had known in the morning
How wearily all the day,
The words unkind would trouble my mind
That I spoke when you went away,
I had been more careful, darling,
Nor given you needless pain;
But we vex our own with look and tone
We may never take back again.

For though in the quiet evening
You may give me the kiss of peace,
Yet it well might be that never for me
The pain of the heart should cease!
How many go forth at morning
Who never come home at night!
And hearts have broken for harsh words spoken
That sorrow can never set right.

Probably nine-tenths of the outward sins into which Christians fall are sins of conversation. It would be better if we read more and talked less, with an improvement in quality. Reading families require far less attention of the pastor than those that don't read. They are far less complaining and fault-finding, for the good reason that they have something to read about, and think about, and talk about, other than the village gossip, or whether the minister visits them less than the family over the way. Especially should we be slower to express judgment. It has been said, that "one must be really courageous who would suspend judgment on any subject in these days. Whatever topic happens to come to the front instantly stimulates people, not to search the libraries for information, or to seek solitude for quiet thought, but to quick expression of opinion." One would not suppose the divine caution had ever been spoken. "Judge not." That word certainly does not forbid us to condemn a "clearly proved wrong," but warns us against hasty judgments. How frequent, too, are the thoughtless lies of our daily lives—the promise to do something, or go somewhere at a certain time, which we disregard altogether, or keep but tardily. To promise to pay a bill Monday, which we do not pay till Tuesday, is a lie. To promise to meet a friend at 8 o'clock, and get there at 8:30, is a falsehood. To repeat a remark we have not verified, may make us untrue.

Large or Small Families?

A SYMPOSIUM OF CHRISTIAN HERALD READERS

Edited by MARGARET E. SANGSTER

SEVERAL weeks ago, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD placed before its readers, editorially, some reflections on the comparative advantages of the small or the large family. The article closed by asking for suffrages, and the answers have been pouring in with every mail since then. The conclusions of intelligent men and women on this timely theme are diverse, and all the more interesting on that account. We present a number of the letters received, and ask all to notice that the subject is one which awakens earnest thought. When the President of the United States sounds a warning note, and tells us that we may fear "race suicide," it is indeed time for us to consider this matter, and see where we agree or disagree with him.

Our first letter comes from a man, whose voice we may well listen with respect:

Wealth Should Not Shirk Privilege

In my extensive journeyings, it has always been a source of regret, when moving among the better and wealthier classes, to find comparatively few—and I lament to add, in some instances—no children. There are two places that cannot be called home—one is the motherless abode, the other the childless. With all that society, influence, and money can produce, how passing strange that here the fatherly and motherly instincts should be missing.

Yet, when we leave the divans, the tapestry, and the Oriental hangings of the wealthy homes, and pass down the swarming streets and crowded alley-ways of the tenement districts, behold the children! Witness the single rooms that shelter five, seven, and even nine little ones!

One may say: "This is but as it should be!" Nay! the opposite should be the case. The larger proportion should rather be where God has given the means wherewith to rear, train, and educate childhood.

The burden is unequally borne, and as a result, we have the fashionable with too few children, and the poor with too many!

BALLINGTON BOOTH.
President of the Volunteers of America.

The next speaker is an alarmist, and comes to us from North Carolina, where large families are still in fashion. He is firmly established in the opinion he presents:

Quality Better Than Quantity

Those who believe that this is the age of small families, have certainly taken a very limited view of the subject. From Maine to California, in town or country, the family of from five to eight children is the rule and not the exception, and that the population of the world is growing with wonderful rapidity is amply demonstrated by statistics. This increase proves, if it proves anything, that the majority of the world's population is unthinking and irresponsible, and that the advent of their progeny into the world is purely accidental, and unconnected with even the love for and desire to have children. Therefore the discussion of this topic can be of interest only to the thinking part of our people, only a small percentage of the whole. This percentage is reluctant to have the responsibility of large families, not because it robs them of selfish pleasures, but because they do not see their way to doing their duty by many children.

Men and women who have the care of large families are cut off from all intellectual and spiritual activity. No matter how fine their mental powers, and their ability to labor for the good of the Master's cause, all their talents are allowed to rust; while otherwise they could do more justice to their own, if they had but few, and were permitted to exercise their gifts properly. Thus, Church and Sunday School work suffer by being deprived of the aid of those who are competent to help.

I offer no plea for small families for the sake of selfish enjoyment, but for the good of the children and for the sake of the good the parents can do.

L. T. RIGHTSELL.

A physician, on the other hand, in a private letter, gives a solemn warning against the sin of destroying unborn life, a sin which some mothers do not hesitate to take upon themselves, because children will interfere with their convenience and pleasure. Surely no wife who deliberately attempts this crime, can ever lift a blameless soul to God's altar.

A Woman's Opinion

There is undoubtedly much that is pleasant, desirable, beautiful, in the large family; nevertheless, as the processes of social evolution go on, it is more than probable that small families will become the rule; nor on the whole, perhaps, is this to be regretted. For one thing, it removes the fear that in the millennium the earth will be overstocked with inhabitants. They who adopt the day-year principle in prophecy, namely, that a day stands for a year, believe that there will yet be not merely one thousand, but 360,000 years of prosperity and peace. But even in that case, a perfectly balanced race would never overpopulate the earth. "Among mankind," says one, "as in the animal creation, it is usually low life that is prolific, and high life that is chary of over-population." People who have few resources for enjoyment, come to depend almost exclusively on domestic gratifications, and naturally dote on large families. They who give full play to their higher faculties, may be just as happy, just as useful, with the smaller family as others with the larger one. The "children of the resurrection," we know, will be happy even with none.

AMELIA H.

The next contributor to the discussion is a pastor, in Norfolk, Va., who takes a view which is suggestive and appealing. From one in the pulpit, the word comes with authority:

America's Crowning Sin

You are doing a great service to the cause of humanity in opening the columns of your beneficent paper, if only for a little while, to expose the selfishness of individuals, and racial danger of extinction on the part of those who are guilty of America's crowning sin, as it is the crowning sin of France also, the prevention of offspring by married people. The figures are alarming. It is not long since the State of Massachusetts showed 82,000 families with but one child in each. This evil is depopulating our country homes, making barren our villages, producing divorces in city life (for nothing holds hearts together like many children), and passing over to the foreign born, also to the illiterate and the criminal classes, our fair land. The brave and able New Englanders of other days have but few family successors. It is not a question of quality against quantity, but of extinction, of the blotting out of the old American families, the genuine American stock, should such a state of things continue.

There can be no greater mistake, to say nothing of the loss of all faith in God, than to think that a large family hinders prosperity. The elder Vanderbilt began life poor and became the father of many children, but they did not stand in his way of amassing a great fortune. Children nerve men to fight the harder. But the bliss of life is not found in the amount of money one possesses. All honor to those sturdy men and noble women who find in the children that gather around them their wealth and joy.

J. J. HALL.

A story of personal experience is always interesting:

Fifty-five Thousand Loaves

Some years ago a trusted employee became anxious about his income because of his numerous family. After much consultation with his wife, he ventured to ask his employer—a very exemplary man—about this question. He was requested to remain a short time after business hours, that they might talk the matter over.

Coming into the young man's office the merchant picked out of his match box three matches, and said, "Nearly fifty years ago I used these to light my fiery serpents. On one occasion, as I saw the fire on the match spluttering as if in glee at my folly, the thought forcibly impressed me, 'A fool at one end and fire at the other.' Since then not a match or fiery serpent has touched my lips. Since then the three matches have sufficed to light my fires and gas. The three fiery serpents—which I note you use each day—have put bread for my three loaves of bread each day for fifty years, a total of about 55,000 loaves for my family. If you will do as I did, I will increase your salary fifteen cents a day for the next six months, and double it the remainder of the year and then as the cloud of smoke—which I dislike—disappears from your brain, I will increase your salary sufficient to make you a partner in my business, for the sake of your family and Him who took them in his arms and said, 'Bring them unto me and forbid them not.' As to wine—which I see you indulge in occasionally—I was cured of it by an incident in our home, when, reading Isa. 65: 8, my wife asked me what the new wine in the cluster meant; and our daughter Ruth answered, 'Why, ma, our teacher told us to-day that cluster means a group, and we are a group—the baby in the cradle, I on your lap, and David and Jess, one on each of papa's knees.' As I read the words, 'One saith, destroy it not,' I stopped, because my heart was too full for further utterance. I have also had my attention drawn to the fact that parents who seek only worldly pleasures seldom produce sons of genius or daughters of moral integrity. Think of this for two weeks, then let me know your decision." He embraced the opportunity. To-day they all rejoice in their happy Christian homes.

JACOB FLOMERFELT.

Another correspondent sums up the whole thing in a nutshell, with a degree of conviction that will probably meet answering sympathy in some, if not many, quarters. In his mind

All Depends on the Income

A great discussion has arisen as to the correct number of children which the American household should contain. The writer's opinion may be expressed in a few words, viz., small income, small family, and vice versa. Not half the pauperism and misery would exist that now do, were this suggestion followed. Better have three or four well educated children than a dozen or more ignoramuses.

Not long ago mention was made in the daily papers of a certain woman on the East Side of New York, mother of ten children, who claimed to be supremely happy in the care of her flock, though poverty was the only legacy which she could leave them at her death. How a mother can be happy with her children growing up about her in ignorance is more than I can comprehend. Why do we clamor for a larger population? The cities are overcrowded now. It is not quantity but quality which is lacking. While it is to be admitted that a large family contributes to the happiness and contentment of a household, this proviso should also be made—that each one be given the opportunity to develop along the lines on which his or her talent lies. The "prattle of childish voices" sounds poetic, to be sure, but to quote the poet's own words,

Life is real, life is earnest, and when the child grows up to the age of understanding, and realizes its own helplessness and misery, because of the poverty with which it is surrounded, when that same voice is raised in reproaches and complainings, then the poetry dissolves into wretched reality.

INDIGNANT.

The symposium is like the shifting of a kaleidoscope. In every view given there is a residuum of truth, and we cannot help thinking that such free and candid utterance of honest opinion, must, in the end, benefit the American home. We have room for one more letter.

The Complaint of the Childless

I am a childless mother, not one who has never had a child, but one whose childless God has taken to himself. As I look on parents with children around their table, and think of the little graves where mine lie, I wonder that any mother of living children ever dares to complain. Where can I find comfort? M.

In adopting some little orphaned one and giving him a good home. If mothers who have been bereaved would thus find comfort, this would be a happier world.

"OF SUCH IS THE KINGDOM"

Dear God, my little child to-night, must sleep within Thy loving care.
Oh, keep her safe till morning light, and listen to her little prayer!

A SUNDAY SCHOOL IN A BARN AT WALTERS

IN THE COLORADO DESERT

How a Missionary Organized Two Sunday Schools

FROM Missionary J. M. Hartley, of the American Sunday School Union, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received the following interesting letter, giving a story of pioneer experience:

"Soon after midnight our belated train came to a stop, far out on the Colorado desert in California, leaving a lone missionary gazing about. No depot, no hotel, no home in sight. The mountains looked cold and lonely in the distance, and only the moon looked friendly. A carrier had been waiting for the pouch of mail which is delivered from this train. He directed me to the nearest house, which I readily found, guided by the barking of a dog. The owner soon had me installed in his warm cot, remarking: 'Sunday School men are as scarce as hen's teeth in this country, and we try to take good care of one when we see him.' Then he lay down on an improvised bed on the floor, and we slept to the music of the coyotes.

"In the morning, I got a saddle-pony from my host, and proceeded to announce to the scattered people that we would have Gospel services twice on the next day. Investigation brought out the tact that the nearest physician, minister, or church was forty miles distant. Once or twice a year some Mormon missionaries come around with literature, and hold a service or two.

"A goodly number attended the services, and some seemed helped by them. We organized a Sunday School, placing it in charge of a Christian man who had recently moved there.

"My next opening was at Walters, also on the desert, and a little farther from any church or minister. In this neighborhood water can be secured by boring very deep. Several new families have located here within the past two years. When my mission was made known, a man suggested that we have an all-day meeting in his barn, with a basket dinner. So it was arranged. There were horses and cattle in the back part of the barn, but the part used as a wagon shed had a rough floor, and was used for all public meetings in the neighborhood. Our meeting was very successful, and seemed to do the people good. Their hearts were touched. All took hold of the Sunday School willingly, and it is being carried on successfully. Most of them are either Mexicans or a type of Indians. Few speak English, but the more intelligent permit their children to attend school, so that we will have a better chance to help the coming generation. Among others are two little Indian boys. They cannot read, can hardly understand English, but they want to learn.

"Next year a schoolhouse will be built, which will be much more convenient. I hope to be able to arrange for occasional preaching for them; but the distance is so great for a minister to go, and the expense so heavy that they will probably get but little care, outside of what the missionary can give them. I supplied them with a good Sunday School library, with money sent through Mr. Bancroft, which I am sure will prove helpful.

"I feel sure that you will not forget to pray for these communities, and for the one who tries to help them."

Any one desiring further information about the work of the American Sunday School Union can write to Rev. E. P. Bancroft, Secretary, 158 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

Spring Days at Mont-Lawn

BEAUTIFUL Mont-Lawn, our Children's Home on the Hudson, begins to look as if our children ought to "come home." The lady ferns, the little white hepatica, anemones, blue wood-violets, queer little "Dutchman's breeches," creamy blood-root, and other heralds of the spring-tide, peeping up here and there in the woods, seem waiting for bright child eyes to find them, and eager child hands to pluck them. Soon fruit trees will be like pink and white clouds of beauty and fragrance. Birds are twittering, robin readbreast and his little wife parade up and down the lawn, squirrels play hide and seek in the big trees, and everything seems to say: "Children, where are you? Come home!"

And the children—well, they hear the call. Missionaries are receiving scrawlly little letters—O, such queer, pathetic, funny little letters—begging to go to Mont-Lawn, "when the country opens." Here are extracts from some.

I am writing you these few lines to let you know what I'm writing you about. We want to go to Mont-Lawn. Mamma wants us to have a chance She can't send us out in any fresh air. She can't hardly make much money washing; coal was so high. Signed by six children—the oldest eleven, the youngest six.

I heard thare was flowers growin thare an gras. I heard I cud play on em. An' there was milk an to ete. An scups. I will cum to the bible house an I hope you will let me go thare.

Scarcity of coal, and the high price of provisions have made the winter a trying one on the city's poor. That mother, whose six children will be kept at Mont-Lawn for ten days, and be sent home clothed in good, new garments, will be greatly helped. We hope to lighten the burdens of hundreds of hard-working tenement mothers this summer. Who will aid us? It costs only $3 to give one child a ten days' outing; $6 sends two; $18 sends six; $36 twelve; and so on. $21 supports a cot for the season; it can be named for the sender, or for a beloved one passed away. Any garments that children can wear are welcome. All gifts sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York, will be promptly acknowledged.

Called Higher

C. E. F., Williamstown, Ky., writes: As a member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family, I tell of the sudden death of my dear daughter, Anna Fry, the last member of my family, a wife and two sweet children having preceded her. I am an invalid, and Anna was an angel of love and devotion to me, ever ready and willing at any hour, day or night, to administer to my comfort and necessity. She was twenty-seven years old. She was much attached to her church and Sunday School, and lived a life beautifully consistent. While engaged in domestic duties and singing a hymn, she was suddenly stricken, dying without speaking again, yet I know in whom she trusted.

Mrs. E. P. Requa entered into life eternal in her eighty-first year, having been a blessing herself to every life with which she came in touch. She was for a long time a member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family, for over sixty years a member of the Methodist Church, and a faithful worker.

OUR SUNDAY HOUR WITH THE LITTLE FOLKS

COMPETITION 36

What three proper names mentioned in Scripture do these pictures represent?

Write "Competition 36" plainly across the top of a postal card or sheet of paper; next, your name, age and address; then the answers. For each of the three answers employ but one word—the proper name which you think the pictures represent. Don't quote Scripture passages; simply state the name. Below the answer, write, in not over twenty words, what, in your judgment, are the most important facts concerning the subject of the first of these pictures? Read the rules given below.

RULES AND PRIZES

Contests are not open to competitors over fourteen years of age. Do not send two solutions. There is no objection to asking the help of others, but each competitor must send in the answers in his or her own handwriting. Should you use paper instead of a postal card, be sure to write on the envelope in which you enclose your answer "Competition 36." Write on one side of paper only.

Prizes—For the best answer to Competition 36, a handsome silver watch, lady's or gentleman's. For the second best answer, our Smith-Peloubet Bible Dictionary; the third, School of the Woods, a delightful book, by William G. Long, beautifully illustrated; for the fourth, A Real Queen's Fairy Tales, by Carmen Sylva, Queen of Roumania. For the next best answer from each State, territory and Canadian province sending meritorious responses to competitions, a beautiful book as consolation prize.

All answers must be mailed not later than April 27. Address, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Little Folks' Department, Bible House, N. Y.

Answer to Competition 29, in our issue of March 18, is "Moses appointing Joshua his successor." Answers to "Curious Questions" of that date are: 1. Jonah paid his fare, whereas public men of to-day often secure passes. Jonah 1: 3. . . . 2. The Eunuch of Ethiopia. Acts 8: 27, 38. . . . 3. When the restoration of Jerusalem under Nehemiah's direction was in process, the people complained of their lot, saying: "We have mortgaged our lands, vineyards and houses that we might buy corn, because of the dearth." Neh. 5: 3. . . . 4. Agricultural implements mentioned in Scripture are: the axe (which when used in clearing land comes under this classification); basket (used in tossing or conveying grain); coulter (the meaning is variously understood as a sort of mattock or a ploughshare); fan (used in winnowing grain); fork, goad, harrow, mattock, muzzle, ox-goad, plow, pruning-hooks, rod, scythe, sickle, "threshing instrument" (Amos 1: 3); "sharp threshing instrument having teeth" (Isa. 41: 15); shovel, sieve, staff. There were irrigating machines in Scriptural days, but the name for them is not given. Wagons and carts were in use. "Threshing-floors," which cannot, of course, be classed as "implements," were yet so essential to the threshing process, that mention by our little readers was too natural, to be counted against them as an error. The first form of the hoe and the plow were two sticks with which ground was stirred or broken. Exigencies of space forbid publication of essays.

Announcement of Prize-Winners in Competition of March 18

For the best description of the picture, "Scripture Problem No. 29," of March 18, Donald McDougall, Bangor, P. E. I., receives a silver watch; for the best answers to "Curious Questions" of same date, Margaret E. Gettle, Steinauer, Neb., receives a silver watch. Each of the following receives a book:

Mission Work in the Canaries

Mrs. T. MacKnight, of the Mission at Laguna, Teneritte, Canary Islands, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

We are working among the Spanish people in these islands, where the priests have wholly had their own way. Many come from the town of Laguna to argue and to try us. There are forty priests in Laguna, and it is the seat of the bishop and of the priests' college. The bishop has appealed to the civil authorities of the island to put us out. In Teneritte, we have around us some true converts, three Bible-women, who go about to the villages with great joy, and the work is increasing. The women that attend our meetings with their families are called "devils" by their neighbors, and there is strong feeling against them. We need the prayers and sympathy and help of friends. We ask some to post to us Christmas cards, calendars, etc. These things please here, and look on the Christian work. Pictures of a sort for the houses and cottages are most acceptable. At our girls' class, needle is taught in knitting and in making children's clothes. The national feast in England I send you a photograph of ploughing in these islands. We look for the prayers and help of your people.

A TENERIFFE FARMER AT THE PLOUGH

A Heroic Rescue

Mr. A. A. Hodett, of Benson, Vt., while on his way to Fair Haven, Vt., in passing a house found the cat of Mrs. [illegible] leaving his home to rescue the horse and cutters, in answer to the screams of a woman whom he found sick in bed. Taking her in his arms, he carried her and through two rooms to safety. Before he could succeed the fire spent his clothing, his own clothes were burned, his face and neck were badly burned, also the skin of his head, his body, and his right hand, but the woman was saved. All honor to the courage and self-sacrifice of such a man, who risked his own life to save another.

Deafness Overcome

Louisville man originates a simple little device that instantly restores the hearing—fits perfectly, comfortably and does not show.

190-page book FREE: tells all about it

Since the discovery of a Louisville man it is no longer necessary for any deaf person to carry a trumpet, a tube or any such old-fashioned device, for it is now possible for any one to hear perfectly by a simple invention that fits in the ear and cannot be detected. The honor belongs to Mr. George H. Wilson, of Louisville, who was himself deaf and now hears as well as any one. He calls it Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drum, is built on the strictest scientific principles, containing no metal of any kind, and is entirely new in every respect. It is so small that no one can see it, but nevertheless it collects all sound waves and diverts them against the drum-head, causing you to hear perfectly. It will do this even when the natural ear drums are partially or entirely destroyed, perforated, scarred, relaxed or thickened. It fits any ear from childhood to old age, and aside from the fact that it does not show, it never causes the hearer irritation, and can be used with comfort day or night.

It will relieve deafness whether acquired from catarrh, scarlet fever, typhoid or brain fever, measles, whooping cough, gathering in the ear, shocks from artillery or through accidents. It not only relieves, but stays the progress of deafness and all roaring and buzzing noises. It does this in a simple, sure and scientific way. The effect is immediate.

Let every person who needs this at once send to the company for its 190-page book, which you can have free. It describes and illustrates Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drums and contains many bona fide letters from numerous users in the United States, Canada, Mexico, England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, Australia, New Zealand, Tasmania, India. These letters are from people in every station of life—clergymen, physicians, lawyers, merchants, society ladies, etc—and tell the truth about the benefits to be derived from the use of this wonderful little device. You will find among them the names of people in your own town or State, and you are at liberty to write to any of them you wish and secure their opinion as to the merits of the only scientific ear drums for restoring the hearing to its normal condition.

Write to-day and it will not be long before you are again hearing. Address, for the free book and convincing evidence,

WITHOUT GOD IN THE WORLD

By Emma Bates Harvey

II.

I WENT to college and enjoyed my life there, for I was a born student. The years sped on. I only one profession could ever be my choice, and that was my father's.

It was during my college life, that I found out that I loved Edith. The discovery was one of both pain and pleasure, for I knew her father would be bitterly opposed to his daughter's marrying the "infidel," as I was called throughout our county. But although I had been prepared for this opposition, I was not expecting that Edith herself would place religious convictions paramount to her love for me, for that she did love me, I felt sure in my heart was true.

I told her of my love on one of my vacation days, and never was she dearer to me than when, still trembling in my arms, she started away, and said, "Philip, you will never know how much I love you, but I never can marry you, even if father would consent, unless you first become a Christian." At first, I couldn't believe it,—couldn't believe in her decision, in her will-power; but as time went on, and I saw her unmoved in her determination, though evidently it cost her much, I was obliged to submit to the inevitable, and hated God more and more.

Again and again I came to her, but on the morning of my twenty-fourth birthday, I awoke to the realization that I, although with one year's successful practice at the bar, wealthy and with apparently every advantage in life, could never marry the woman I loved, and was of all men most miserable.

Even then I never thought of blaming Edith, but loved her most desperately, and blamed God the more. That summer I was down upon the Cape, camping with some college fellows.

We were out driving one day, when passing through a grove of trees, our attention was hailed by a sound of singing. "Camp meeting, as sure as you live!" said one of the boys. "Let's attend," was at once the suggestion.

In a spirit of fun, we soon found our way into the outer part of the circle, where there were nearly a thousand people gathered, listening to a preacher. A strange familiarity about his voice soon showed me that the speaker was no less than my old friend, Rev. Ezra White! It had been years since I had heard him preach, and I must admit that there was both eloquence and wisdom in the sermon. It made a much deeper impression upon me than I cared to acknowledge. I looked up, and saw that my companions were also evidently affected.

In ringing tones, came the words from the preacher, "Without God in the world! How awful a fate! Take God from your heart, your home, the world, and what is left? An awful darkness, a hell of despair, an eternity of woe! Young man, you owe everything you have to God! Without him you are a lost soul. Through Jesus Christ, he has redeemed you. Repent, before it is too late. Young man, would you be without God forever?"

What madness possessed me? What fiends held sway, that I arose, and in answer to the last question, hurled at the minister the awful words, "Yes, I would be without God, always, I hate him so!"

I never shall forget the dreariness of the moment that followed—the solemn stillness that fell on one thousand people—the awful hoarseness of the preacher's voice, as in tones of thunder came the words: "He has chosen. God forgive him. From this time forth he shall be without God in the world!"

The vast crowd were on their knees. Fearful, most dreadful, was the kneeling silence of the thousand people! Not one stirred. Their lips seemed locked by supernatural power. I tried to arise, but couldn't. Even my companions were on their knees. An awful shiver went through my frame. I trembled from head to foot. I suffered fearfully, indescribably. Was it physical? Physical, moral, spiritual, all three, I can't tell. I never have been able to tell what that suffering was like. It was the torment of fiends! I tried to arise again. I couldn't. Just then, a voice—Edith's voice, arose in that grand old hymn, "Jesus, the name high over all." At the sound of that first word, "Jesus," I could not control myself, I shrieked and ran from the grove. On, on I rushed, as if impelled by demons.

What followed I do not remember, but they tell me that I was found five miles away from the meeting, prostrate on the road, and delirious with fever.

For three long months, between life and death, Edith watched over me, and then they said I would live. I was told that it was her nursing that saved me, and when, of her own accord, she said she would marry me and take care of me on an ocean voyage, I felt not at all surprised, but loved her more than ever.

I had had several strange relapses, the cause for which no one could account. One day, Edith's father had knelt down to pray, I suppose, and I was too weak to object, but the very sight of him on his knees was too much for me; I fell back unconscious on the pillow. It was some hours before I came to myself again, and then I was too weak and weary to wonder what ailed me.

Gradually I gained strength, and one day, for the first time, dragged myself to a mirror. I didn't recognize the being that looked back at me from the glass. Was that haggard-looking, prematurely old man I? Impossible! What misfortune had came over me? I screamed in dismay, and Edith hurried to my side and comforted me.

The day before we were to sail, we were married in the little cottage room that had now become a part of my life. They thought I was much better, and with Edith's hand in mine, we stood before her father. Slowly he began the marriage ceremony. Strange sensations crept through my frame. I used all the will power of which I once had so boasted when the last words came, "By the authority of a minister of the Gospel, according to the laws of the State of Massachusetts, I pronounce you husband and wife. What God hath joined together, let not man put asunder."

It was useless, all the will power in the world could not have prevented it, the awful suffering with which I was now becoming so familiar, mastered me, I no longer heard the words of the beautiful marriage service, but in their place rang to my innermost being, the words, "Without God in the world forever!" and I fell a helpless heap at the feet of my wife.

Our ocean journey was delayed by my untimely illness, but in the society of my wife I gained rapidly, and finally we started for the Continent. My physical strength was fast coming back to me, but to my horror I found I was subject to peculiar psychic laws, of which the slightest violation would bring most awful penalty.

My relation with Edith was very much strained. I didn't understand her. God knows I loved her, and I know well how true she was to me, but there was a pitying, half-frightened expression she had at times that greatly irritated me.

It was weeks before either of us mentioned my camp-meeting visit, with its dire effects, but we both were conscious that it was continuously uppermost in our thoughts. Religion was a subject we always tacitly avoided.

One night Edith had pleaded a sick headache, and retired early to our cabin. Soon following her, as I opened the door quickly I found her on her knees. The sight actually maddened me, and if it had not been for one of my old attacks coming on, I do not know what the outcome might have been.

A terrible knowledge was gradually coming over me. I would not admit it to myself, but I knew I was cursed among men—and no longer could take delight in the ordinary pursuits and pleasures.

I had at first anticipated much pleasure from the voyage, in the thought of having Edith read to me, but we soon found out that at the very mention of the word "God" in any poem or story, one of my attacks would instantly come on again. We dared not admit it to each other. I know now how hard Edith tried to find articles that left out all reference to a deity. To while away the tedious hours of an ocean voyage, a Shakespeare Club was formed. I really supposed I could enjoy it, but the very first reading sent me back to my cabin in awful agony. Shakespeare believed in a God, and his plays were full of his belief. It was an awful crisis to me when, for the first time, I realized that the world of literature, of which I had always been so fond, was hereafter a closed continent to me. I couldn't believe it. I tested myself on Browning, Dante, Milton, and even the Bible, only to find that, not to speak of the awful agony that I must endure, if I would even preserve my reason, I must indeed be henceforth without God in the world!

Edith and I had always been passionately fond of music, and many were the duets we had enjoyed together. Music was surely left to me as a consolation in my misery.

One night, we had been singing some college songs in the cabin. For fifteen minutes I was almost happy again. Then a young lady started to sing, "Jesus, lover of my soul." I saw Edith start with an appealing glance at me. I rushed for the gang-way, but it was too late. I was carried in agony to my state room.

WITHOUT GOD IN THE WORLD

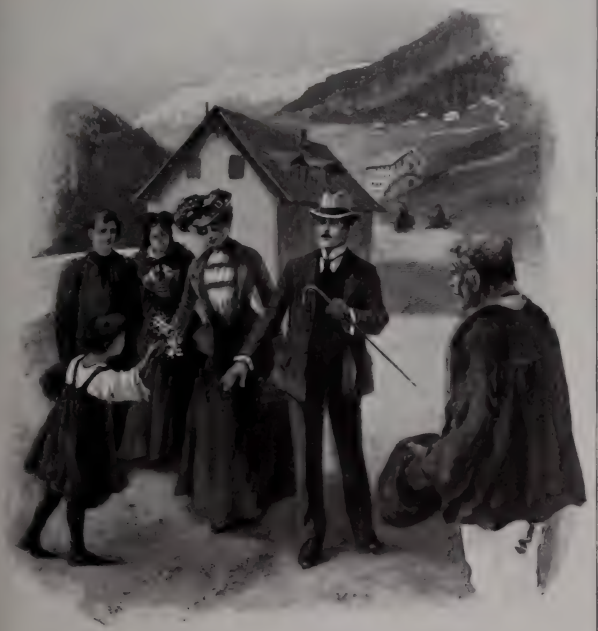
From that moment, I kept closet than ever to my room. No longer did I even care to eat my meals with the other passengers. I ran too great a risk of the hearing of that hated name.

Our voyage was ended, and for six months we wandered through Europe. I sought one doctor after another, but it was all in vain. I think the most of them thought me insane. They all acknowledged their helplessness to aid me. From one noted place to another we went, but with no thought of pleasure.

The art-galleries, how much pleasure we had anticipated in these! After a few attempts, I dared not visit one. Wherever I went, some Raphael had invaded with an "Infant Christ"; some Hofman or Rubens. Thorwaldsen closed the world of sculpture for me. Take the image, the painting, the spirit of Christ out of the art-galleries of Europe, and what is there left?

The cathedrals, those "poems in stone," that in themselves would repay the devotion of the most ardent tourist, I dared not even enter.



"THEIR SIMPLE GREETING, 'GOD BE WITH YOU,' AFFECTED ME CRUELLY"

Their very sight so affected me, that from one station to another we would travel in closed carriages.

In Paris, a strange fancy seized me. I would visit the home of Voltaire, and there, indeed, I might find peace!

Almost happy again, I called a carriage and drove to the home of this noted infidel. My first admonition that anything was wrong, was to feel warnings of a return of my attacks, and glancing up, I found the sign, "American Bible House," and was told that Voltaire's home had been torn down, and that this was in its place!

At first, in natural scenery I found relief, but it was of short duration. My mother's words on the plastic memory of her little boy had been done too well. I had learned too many Bible verses that applied to the work of nature. Standing in the Swiss mountains, after once the words had flashed across my mind, "The strength of the hills are His!" I could no longer enjoy the wondrous scenery.

At evening I stood on Mont Blanc. I had been restless in my little room, and was vainly seeking peace. Thousands of stars shone forth, but had not my mother taught me that "God had numbered them all! That he knew them each by name?" One moment the great beauty thrilled my very being—the next, even as I heard one of the party repeating Addison's beautiful lines

> The spacious firmament on high,
> With all the blue ethereal sky,
> And spangled heavens a shining frame,
> Their great Original proclaim!

I cowered and shivered, and then, in spasms of pain, was carried within the hotel, there on my bed to spend the rest of that lovely night in tossing agony! The cattle of the "thousand hills" became an annoyance to me, when I remembered their maker was God.

In going from one little peasant village to another, their simple greeting of "God be with you!" affected me cruelly, and I would groan aloud at the sight of the wayside crosses. I found my condition, whatever it was, was becoming worse.

Whereas at first it was necessary to hear or see the word "God" to lose control of myself, now the mere thought would have the same effect.

We hurried home to America, and on my estate, my beautiful birthright, in which once I had taken so much pride, I shut myself in to a living death.

Can words describe the torture of our lives at this period?

We Holbrooks were a proud race. We traced our lineage back near to the crown of England, and each generation had held the honor of the name intact. We had prided ourselves on our character as gentlemen. What was my horror to find that since this strange mental condition of mine, my very nature was changing. I, who had, when a man grown, wept over a sick dog, was now actually cruel! I delighted in beating my horses. I strangled a pet cat one night for pure pleasure, and kept repeating to myself in fiendish glee, "A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast." I was enough of a psychologist to watch with interest as well as horror, the gradual change that could come over a man without a God!

I soon found that anything that occurred to me as being a direct command of God was a sufficient compelling force to at once make me long to disobey that command. I still did some little law business. My honesty had never been impeached even by my enemies.

One day I remembered that God said, "Thou shalt not steal." That was sufficient. With all the cunning and skill of which I was the master, I at once developed a scheme that for rascality and fraud I had never seen equalled. I cheated the widow of a dear friend out of $20,000, and was glad.

"THE WHOLE WORLD IS QUEER"

QUAINT PSALMS for QUEER FOLK

BY REV. C. H. YATMAN

PSALM CIX—Swearer's Psalm

17. As he loved cursing, so let it come unto him: as he delighted not in blessing, so let it be far from him.

18. As he clothed himself with cursing like as with his garment, so let it come into his bowels like water, and like oil into his bones.

"HE CLOTHED HIMSELF WITH CURSING"

This Psalm is right. You can never trust the word of a swearer. The man who blasphemes is wicked, he will play the double and talk "against you as quickly" as against God. What an awful life and death and "eternity" will be his when these "Lets" of the Psalm are come to pass. One hundred years hence, many will wish they had never been born.

PSALM CX—Messianic Psalm

1. The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool.

3. Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power, in the beauties of holiness from the womb of the morning: thou hast the dew of thy youth.

4. The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent, Thou art a priest forever after the order of Melchizedek.

"THOU ART A PRIEST FOREVER"

Messiah and Melchizedek mingle here. Messianic fragrance from prophetic fields is borne in by the breezes of the morning. Here you get the spring blossoms of prophecy; in Hebrews you get the fruit full ripe. To a thirsty soul after God, this Psalm, if opened to the mind by the Holy Spirit, is like a drink from the brook in hot summer time.

PSALM CXI
Psalm of Wisdom

10. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom: a good understanding have all they that do his commandments: his praise endureth forever.

"THE FEAR OF THE LORD IS THE BEGINNING OF WISDOM"

This Psalm is like the great entrance to a palace. The first nine verses are the marble steps that lead to the King's Court, for surely verse ten is kingly in its teaching, and if put with Proverbs III. the "wisdom chapter" of the Bible, will make one wise unto salvation, and bring the soul to a place where praise endureth forever.

PSALM CXII
Obedient Man's Psalm

1. Praise ye the Lord. Blessed is the man that feareth the Lord, that delighteth greatly in his commandments.

2. His seed shall be mighty upon earth: the generation of the upright shall be blessed.

3. Wealth and riches shall be in his house: and his righteousness endureth forever.

"WEALTH AND RICHES SHALL BE IN HIS HOUSE"

This Psalm goes with the twentieth of Exodus and John XIV. The Prophet Isaiah in chapter 1, verse 19 gives its true exegesis in small compass. Obedience and blessing go hand in hand, and no modern reading is better than the ancient lore of the Hebrews in Deut. XXVIII. It makes the blood tingle to read that chapter.

A Lone Finnish Colporteur

Andrew Ojala, of Quincy, Mass., a native of Finland, has the distinction of being the only Finnish Bible colporteur in the United States. The Finnish Synod (corresponding with the Episcopal Church) has organized congregations in many different towns. Mr. Ojala travels widely among these congregations, and has been the means of distributing thousands of copies of the Word of Life among his people. Many of the Finlanders speak English and are readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

ANDREW OJALA

A Gem of Kindness

Among many beautiful deeds of self-sacrifice and kindness filling the annals of our Finland Famine Relief work, that shown by the following letter surely has honorable place. It is written by the pastor of St. Paul's Colored Mission, Rev. P. J. Wallace, 237 West Fortieth street, New York City. The members are poor and worthy negroes of the laboring class. They have no church of their own, but gather together for worship in a little hall, which they secure when they can and as best they can. The largest individual gift in the total mentioned below was ten cents. It was their entire collection one Sunday when the pastor had told them about the starving Finns. "Some of them cried," he said, "and all gave gladly."

Editor of The Christian Herald:—Kindly add the $3.70 which we send herewith to the Finland Relief Fund, in the name of our little mission. Although we have no permanent place of meeting, and struggle sharply for existence, yet we are so deeply touched by the appeal of the Finnish sufferers, we willingly take the above amount from our rent money, and wish it were more Our object, our mission on earth, is the glory of God and the relief of suffering humanity. We feel that we must help too.

"Gates Ajar"

Of your premium book, The Speaking Oak, I wish to tell you that I am greatly pleased. I have just read the article, "Gates Ajar." Well do I remember the circumstances related, for I was at Litta's funeral; that last tribute by Bloomington to the songstress will never be forgotten by me. I have taken THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for many years, and for many years have also sent an extra copy and premium to some friend. May it long continue its good works. Respectfully,

THE STORY, SO OLD! SO NEW!

(A New Missionary Hymn, Written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, by Erwin H. Richards.)

ON the western shores of the Indian main,
In the province wild of Inhambane,
Three millions of people are waiting for you
To tell them the story, so old! so new!

Oft, when the blazing sun has set
I wander forth, while 'tis twilight yet,
To meet the chief, with his headmen near,
And ask: "Brave man, is there naught you fear?"

"Alas! O white man, we fear the night,
The leopard's stealth and the lion's might;
The magic force of the witches' wand,
And diseases fell—beyond command.

But we shudder the more and quake," he saith,
"At that fathomless mystery we call Death.
Life is sweet and the kraal is dear,
But that sudden end is always near.

Tell us, O man, shall we meet again?
And if so, how, or where, or when?
Perchance to you there is given Light,
Whereas with us, 'tis dark as night."

"I am the Way," the white man reads;
He teaches him Christ for all his needs.
"Life's but a journey through the night,
Death's but the dawn of eternal Light."

Slowly but surely the "Story of Old"
Changes the heart of this chieftain bold.
But millions of others are waiting for you
To tell them "The Story," so old! so new!

A GREAT PREACHER DEAD

Dean Farrar, Author, Educator and Preacher, Passes Away

FEW men in the English Church who have passed away in recent times, have left so important a place vacant as has Dean Farrar. The politicians who dispense ecclesiastical patronage did little for him, but it is safe to predict that long after the archbishops and bishops they appointed are forgotten, the name of Frederick William Farrar will continue a household word. Though he visited this country only once, he had many friends here, who had learned to admire him through his works and whose love he won by his charming personality. A man of wide erudition, he preached for the common people, and as with the Master, they heard him gladly. But it is by his works that Dean Farrar will be remembered most widely. Beginning with fiction relating chiefly to schoolboy life, he turned to philosophy and philology, and produced the volumes on languages which won him the coveted Fellowship in the Royal Society. In 1868 appeared Seekers After God, a volume of biographical sketches. It was in 1874, however, he found his true place in literature by the production of his Life of Christ. This work, rich in historic allusion, and vivid in picturesque description, had an enormous circulation on both sides the Atlantic. In England alone twelve editions were exhausted the first year. It was translated into many foreign languages and was warmly commended by foreign theologians. This work was followed by the Life of St. Paul and the Early Days of Christianity, and several shorter works.

Dr. Farrar was seventy-two years of age when he died. For several months, he had been so enfeebled that he could not preach, and as he would not stay away from the services in the Cathedral of Canterbury, of which he was Dean, he was carried thither daily. His mind, however, lost none of its clearness nor alertness. To the last, his conversation was bright and cheerful. He was the son of a missionary clergyman and was born in India. After passing through the University of London with high honors, he became Master of the famous schools of Marlborough and Harrow. In 1876, he was made a Canon of Westminster, and it was then that his splendid qualities as a preacher were first recognized. In the historic Abbey, in St. Margaret's Church, or in the Cathedral of St. Paul's, whenever he preached, large audiences of the most cultured people in London assembled to hear him. His sweet, tender nature shrank from the sterner truths of his creed, and he ever clung to the hope that, even for those who die impenitent, God, in his infinite mercy, might provide a way by which they might be saved. A series of sermons, which he called the "Eternal Hope," he preached on this theme. They brought a storm of denunciation about his ears, but though he would not argue, he could not be moved. Dr. Farrar, throughout his life, was a stalwart advocate of total abstinence, and an earnest pleader with his aristocratic hearers for righteousness of life.

A Trust Builder in Knee Trousers

ROY DUDLEY is the "Promoter" of a "Trust"

Composed of school boys in a Virginia city. In organizing his "combine" he displayed the energy and ingenuity of a Morgan. His dividends amounted to $48.20 the first month.

A few months ago young Dudley started to sell The Saturday Evening Post. He got permission to call upon the employees of two department stores and from 45 of them secured orders to deliver the magazine. The next day he secured 30 more orders from business men. His chum, "Taffy" Wood, became a little envious and wanted to do the same thing, but young Dudley convinced him that to do so would mean "ruinous competition." Instead, he offered to re-sell copies to "Taffy" and to turn over to him a part of the customers already secured, with the understanding that he would get a certain number of new customers. Then he made the same sort of a bargain with Taffy's younger brother.

Three other boys had started to sell The Post before the "combine" was organized. He asked them to join his combination, but they refused his terms and serious trouble was threatened. Next week Master Roy secured 14 new customers in the territory in which his rival was working. Then he offered to "absorb" his competitor by giving him these new customers, provided he would get some more new ones and thereafter buy his copies from the "monopoly." The remaining two boys "compromised" and started work under Roy's direction the following week.

Then Dudley wrote to the publishers explaining what he had done, and offered to place a standing weekly order for three months, provided no new boys were appointed during that time. Within two months he was selling 350 copies a week. One week he sold a thousand copies. This is the record of a boy in knee trousers, ten years old.

If You Will Try It we will send the copies and everything necessary, including A Dainty Little Booklet, in which twenty-five out of more than six thousand bright boys tell in their own way just how they have made a success of selling THE SATURDAY EVENING POST outside of school hours.

Some of these boys are making $10 to $15 a week. You can do the same. NO MONEY REQUIRED TO START. We will furnish ten copies the first week free of charge, to be sold at five cents a copy. You can then send us the wholesale price for as many as you find you can sell the next week.

$225 IN EXTRA CASH PRIZES will be distributed Next Month among our boys

THE PRODIGAL SON*

Lessons from the Most Encouraging of All the Parables

FROM the parable of the Prodigal Son lessons of inestimable value have been drawn in all ages of the Church. It is a gospel in miniature, and from a purely literary standpoint is a story marvelously concise and beautiful. It would be difficult to find in any literature a story in which so vivid and graphic a picture is presented in so few words. We have in it a picture of the man attracted by the pleasures of sin; of his impatience with the restraints of home; of his discovery that the friends of his prosperity desert him in the time of his need; of the kind of relief that the world gives to the impoverished spendthrift—not even the husks reserved for the swine; of the resolve to return as a recovery of reason "he came to himself," his previous condition being aberration; of the welcome he receives from the Father, recognized as a son in spite of his wandering; of the resentment of the elder brother, a lesson in humanity; and of the reproof of the Father, a lesson to the Church in its treatment of a penitent wanderer.

One of the most precious lessons of the Parable is the perpetuity of sonship. The prodigal is a son even in his shame. True, he is an unworthy son, but a son still. If men only realized that fact, how many would return to God. It is hard to recognize in the debased, dissipated dregs of humanity that one occasionally sees, any remnants of a child of God, but we may be sure that there is in everyone, the element which is capable of development, an element that God sees, and which he can bring into supreme control. Let the most abject, degraded creature put himself into God's hands—let him arise and go to his Father, and he will be recognized as a son, and will be made fit for his Father's house. He will find that the rejoicing is mutual. His return is not only a joyful thing for himself, but is a cause of joy to the Father. As the wandering was a misery in its issue, it was a grief to the Father. As the ancient prophet taught, God has no pleasure in the death of the sinner. That is not at all what he wants. The sinner is practically a suicide. He might live and be happy if he would. He retains the privileges of sonship, even though, as he perceives, he has forfeited the right to claim them. He has only to quit his sin and return, and he receives a welcome, not grudging or reproachful, but abounding in love—the welcome of a recovered son. Not even the unbrotherly behavior of the elder son can diminish the cordiality of that welcome.

Last Words in Jerusalem

Paul's Final Testimony to his Countrymen

By Mrs M. Baxter

THAT was a remarkable speech which Paul made to the mob in the Temple (Acts 22: 1: 21). Probably he knew it would be his last public testimony in Jerusalem, and we may know how he would trust that, according to the word of Jesus, it should "be given him in the same hour what he should speak, that it should not be he, but the Spirit of his Father speaking in him" (Matt. 10: 19, 20). Paul established the fact that he was once just as they were now—that he could understand their jealousy for the law; it had been his own. And now he would tell them by what means he had been turned from a hater of Jesus of Nazareth to be his chosen and prominent witness. He showed that it was not of men.

"And it came to pass that, as I made my journey, and was come nigh unto Damascus, about noon, suddenly there shone from heaven a great light round about me. And I fell unto the ground, and heard a voice saying unto me, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou Me! And I answered, Who art thou, Lord? And he said unto me, I am Jesus of Nazareth, whom thou persecutest." The Jewish Scriptures told again and again of how God's light and fire had shone from heaven. Would the Jews now bow down before this startling testimony that God shines down from heaven still? Would they believe in the light from heaven who had rejected the very Light of the world when He walked, the Word made flesh, among them?

Alas! the same powers were at work among them then which are ruining our own youth, and those of other Protestant countries, in the present schools and colleges. Sadduceeism then is called Rationalism now. Reason is spoken of as the test which should pass judgment on the revelation of God from heaven, until the belief in the supernatural is ceasing, and consequently obedience to God has gone out of fashion. Many of our young people fear to be thought wanting in intelligence if they believe in the divine inspiration of Scripture, and if they look for real answers to prayer, or regard God as a living Person who interposes in the life of men on earth. Thus they come to ignore responsibility to God. Sin becomes to them a matter between man and man, as to which God has nothing to do; and a mention of judgment to come, and of hell, provokes a smile. And yet God's truth stands ever the same, and the mighty facts which they ignore will surely meet them—perhaps when it is too late. God's truth is neither injured nor destroyed by men's rejection; by it they must be judged at the last day (John 12: 48). These Jews at Jerusalem bowed before no light from heaven, because they subjected the Scriptures to their reason, and ruled God out of their counsels. So the testimony of Paul fell upon ears deaf against the fact of a present mighty God, and their hearts were closed against the light from heaven, as against the light of Scripture.

Paul showed that the very glory of God which had left Jerusalem and the Temple, because of the people's sins (Ezek. 11: 23) had shone upon him to stop him in his persecution of the followers of Jesus; that the presence of Jesus, whom they had crucified, was in that glory with which their fathers had been familiar. It was the strongest proof that Jesus was God. There were witnesses to prove that Paul saw the light from heaven, and, moreover, the fact of the healing of his sight proved that the divine power of Christ to heal remained amongst Christ's disciples. Would the Jews accept, or once again, and finally, reject the testimony of Christ through Paul! He continued: "And he [Ananias] said, 'The God of our fathers hath chosen thee, that thou shouldst know his will, and see that Just One [R.V. the Righteous One], and shouldest hear the voice from his mouth. For thou shalt be his witness unto all men—not Jews only—of what thou hast seen.'"

All through his narrative, Paul shows that what he did was in exact obedience to the heavenly vision (Acts 26: 19). And now he relates what is mentioned nowhere else, "When I was come again to Jerusalem, even while I prayed in the Temple, I was in a trance, and saw Him saying unto me, Make haste, and get thee quickly out of Jerusalem, for they will not receive thy testimony concerning Me. And I said, Lord, they know what I have done to thy saints and Stephen. And he said, Depart: for I will send thee far hence unto the Gentiles."

Till now the multitude had listened. Now the mad cries arose against him from the crowd as once against his Master: "Away with such a fellow from the earth; for it is not fit that he should live." What was his sin? The belief in a living, present God and Saviour, who willed that all men, Jew and Gentile, should come to the knowledge of the truth. Such is the natural heart of fallen man; such is our heart till we are born again; and now the doom of Jerusalem was sealed, in ten years the city was desolated.

The chief captain could not understand the ground of the popular indignation against Paul, and thinking there must be some evil deed behind, he commanded that Paul should be brought into the castle and examined by scourging or torture, that he might know wherefore they cried so against him. Paul remonstrated against an illegal procedure: "Is it lawful for you to scourge a man that is a Roman, and uncondemned?" A Jew by birth, he was a naturalized citizen of Tarsus, and therefore by law a Roman citizen. The centurion told the chief captain, and the lictors, which would have tried to draw out some confession by torture, departed. Thus Paul was arrested, and from this time his life as the prisoner of the Lord begins. He had passed many examinations in God's school, and his Epistles bear witness of how he had mastered, by the Holy Ghost, one lesson after another, so that he might graduate in the school in which whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth or educateth, and might therefore teach others also.

CONFIDENCE IN GOD*

A Source of Inspiration, Warning, and Undisturbed Peace

ONE of the most potent ideas a man can get into his mind is a conviction of the personality and actual living presence of God. The disguised pantheism of much of our modern teaching is responsible for the indifference of men to religion. The thought of God as "a power that makes for righteousness," the recognition of him in every tree and flower and thing of beauty in the world, has its value in influencing our lives; but the real need is to conceive of God as a living Being, cognizant of our actions and having direct relations with us. He is a Being with whom we have to do. We may ignore him and go our own way in the world, but only at infinite loss to ourselves. We lose the power he offers us for our own development, and the guidance that will save us from disaster. He does not force his influence upon us; it is part of his plan for us that we should voluntarily choose his ways; but he encourages us by assurances of his infinite resources and by promises that they shall be placed at our disposal.

Our lives show how seldom these facts are realized. Christ never wearied of presenting them and enforcing them, yet with the best of men there is not a full grasp of them. It is true that he does not guarantee us against worldly adversity, or accident, or harm. As the ancient writer said in describing Satan's depreciation of Job, there would not be much merit in a man being good, if he was sure that God would make a hedge about him. God would have men trust him even when everything in life seems to be against them. It is hard, sometimes, and it must be very hard for the modern pantheist; but to the man convinced of God's existence and of his infinite love, it should always be possible. The old story of Luther's wife mourning over the death of God is very true to life. Luther saw it at once, and his depression vanished. God lives and cares for us. We wonder how it is that he permits certain things to happen, how it is that he allows wickedness to triumph, and evil to flaunt itself unpunished; but he has some wise reason without a doubt. Happy, then, the man who puts his trust in him. God keeps him in perfect peace to the full measure of his trust, and not death itself can disturb it.

How to Paint a House Cheap

And Have it Guaranteed to Look Better, Wear Longer and Cost Less Than the Best White Lead Paints.

Never Fades, Cracks, Chalks, Peels or Blisters and is Not Affected by Gases. Fifty Sample Colors and Illustrated Booklet Prepaid to Any Address Absolutely Free.

The cost of painting the house and barn, outbuildings and fences is a heavy burden. Cheap paints soon fade, peel or scrape off and white lead and oil costs so much and has to be replaced so often that it is a constant expense to keep the bright, clean appearance so desirable in the cozy cottage home or the elegant mansion. The following are a few of the large users of Carrara Paint:

Pennsylvania R. R. Co.; Pullman Palace Car Co.; Chicago Telephone Co.; Central Union Telephone Co.; Field Museum, Chicago; Kenwood Club, Chicago; Cincinnati Southern; C. & E. I. R. R. Co.; Denver & Rio Grande R. R.; Wellington Hotel, Chicago.

Carrara is used because it lasts longer, never fades, never cracks, never blisters, never peels, covers more surface than the highest priced paints and costs less than the cheap mixed paints that injure instead of protect. There is but one Carrara. It is made by the Carrara Paint Agency, General Offices, 534 Carrara Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio, and anyone having a house to paint should send for 50 free sample colors and our handsome booklet, showing many buildings reproduced in all the colors just as they are painted from this great paint that has stood the most rigid tests for 25 years and, bear in mind, that it is the only paint ever manufactured that is backed by a positive guarantee in every case. Distributing depots in all principal cities. Write to-day and save half your paint bills in the future.

How a Doctor raised his baby on ESKAY'S FOOD

Told in picture & letter

Dr. W. R. Franklin, Rockford, Ill., says in his letter to us:

"For four years ESKAY'S FOOD has been a favorite prescription of mine, and nine months ago, when this boy was born, I resolved to give ESKAY'S FOOD a thorough and exhaustive test. The picture at 8½ months tells the story. It represents nothing abnormal, but a perfect physical development. He weighed

At birth	3 months	6 months	8 months
7¾ lbs.	12 lbs.	19 lbs.	22 lbs.

His only food since his second week has been ESKAY'S, with two short trials of other foods for experimental purposes. He was so perfectly well I wished to see if some other food might not give as good results, but each time it put him out of order, and we were glad to get back to ESKAY'S within 36 hours.

"We have had two other children, bottle babies, carefully fed on other foods, preparations, modified milk, etc. They did fairly well, but always had a good deal of stomach trouble and never thrived as this one has. My experience with ESKAY'S FOOD has been uniformly excellent."

PERSIAN WOMEN WEAVING, SPINNING, AND KNITTING, AFTER THEIR ANCIENT WAYS

DEFT-HANDED WOMEN OF THE ORIENT

By HANNAH YOSEPH JACOBS

WITH the idea that America's busy women may be interested in the occupations of their Persian sisters, it occurred to me that some account of how the latter employ their time, and of how the nimble fingers of Persian children are put to use, would be welcomed by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers.

The women in the house get up while it is quite dark, and do their cooking for the day; about seven or eight o'clock they sit down to their spinning or other handicraft. When I was a child, I loved to listen to the strange, squeaky noise of the rickety wheel my grandmother used, and I often besought her to let me take her place and spin. Sometimes there are several wheels in the same house, and when they are whirring in concert they make a queer chorus. The spinner's task is to prepare thread for the weaver, who sits apart with his simple machine, and sings as his shuttle flies smoothly in and out. The thought that by his labor he shall be able to give something to those dependent upon him, makes him happy. The most privileged person in the house, the eldest daughter, sits, embroidery in hand, just under the sky-light in the roof.

Until recent years, all fabrics for personal adornment or household use were made in the homes of the people; and this is yet the case in places distant from the great cities, where European goods—chiefly from Russia—are worn. Not so very long ago, Persians cultivated, carded, spun, dyed their cotton, and wove it into cloth in their dwellings. They excelled in the art of dyeing cotton fast and beautiful colors—red for women and children, white and dark blue for men, plain white for feminine head-coverings. At certain seasons of the year, women and children went to the fields and mountains to search for the color-producing roots, barks, herbs and berries. It is a pity that they have almost lost their cunning in this matter of fine dyeing. Aged people deplore it, declaring the old-fashioned cloth healthier raiment than the gaudy, fast-fading prints of Russian importation; but the younger generation show increasing preference for the latter.

Silk-production and silk-weaving make one of Persia's greatest industries. The most beautiful and expensive silk carpets and rugs in the world are made in Tabriz. The culture of the silk-worm and much silk-weaving goes on in Persian homes; but heavy European and American demand for Persian carpets, has encouraged the establishment of large factories. Carpet and rug work is mostly done by women, and boys of seven to sixteen years: the latter class, composing two-thirds of the total body of factory toilers, receive four to twenty cents or more daily.

In company with a party of friends, I recently visited the largest carpet factory in Persia. A half hour's walk from the Armenian quarter brought us to the gate, where we were courteously received and conducted over the establishment. We found 1,500 boys employed here, and were told that they consume daily one khavar of bread, cooked in the bakery connected with the factory. Around a large open yard is built a continuous one-story room. On both sides of the room and on each side of the partition running through its centre, sit the children, close together. We watch curiously the little brown hands tying woolen and silken threads into beautiful carpets. Large carpets have six workers on each side; small ones three on each side; a teacher or director presides at each. Instructors sing to the weavers orders like this:

"Tie ten red knots across brother—tie ten red knots above. Tie twelve knots across brother. Tie to the right four red knots. Tie seven dark blue knots to the left, brother. Tie six green knots, brother." All orders are sung. It is a fine thing, since we hardly hear one's self think. Three particularly splendid rugs in hand are for America. The largest carpets are finished in two or three years. Our mats now and then catch words of Mohammedan prayer. We wonder if that is to be put into a pattern, too, but are informed that as it is their time for devotions, some Mohammedan children are praying. A large dyeing room is connected with the factory. We see artists busily engaged in making patterns.

Persian needlework, embroideries and finely woven cotton linens, are known the world over. The sewing-machine has come to Persia. Hardly a prosperous house in Tabriz, Teheran (Persia's most European city), or any other large town but has its sewing machine, and the khanum (lady of the house) uses it. High-class people, until within a few years, thought all work degrading. A Mohammedan lady once told me with disgust that she had caught the wife of a certain high official "mending her own clothes—just like any poor woman!" Wealthy homes have pianos and organs, often valued chiefly as ornaments or curiosities. "Do you play?" you ask high-class ladies, and are answered haughtily: "Our servants play for us." These are native instruments. Many ladies know how to play on guitar, tar or tambourine, but they would never let their servants see them so

STEPS IN THE CHRISTIAN LIFE

A SERMON BY

Rev. David James Burrell, D.D., LL.D.

EPHESIANS 4: 20-24: "Put on the new man which is created in righteousness and true holiness"

THE words, "Ye have not so learned Christ," are full of meaning. It is one thing to learn about Christ and another to learn him. The difference is like that between reading a biography and taking a portrait. If you were to engage an artist to paint your portrait, saying, "Here is a bundle of photographs, here are the main incidents of my life; proceed," he would laugh at you. He must have "sittings," so that he may catch your pose, your manner, your "atmosphere." He must see you face to face and eye to eye, that he may know you. We have been learning about Christ from our youth up; but have we caught his life-giving spirit?

To be a disciple is not necessarily to be a Christian. We sit about his feet, and listen to his words, and believe them, and formulate them into our creed and moral code; and we derive an incalculable benefit from doing so; nevertheless this is not that life eternal which is to know him (John 17: 3). He himself is the one comprehensive fact in the curriculum of our spiritual life. To see him is to see character. To learn him is to imbibe the mind that was in him. To know him is to attain unto the fullness of the stature of a man; as it is written, "We all beholding, as in a glass, the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory as by the Spirit of the Lord." This is the evolution of the saint; the making of a man. There are five steps leading upward to the perfection of character, as follows: First, an apprehension of the fact that the natural man is sold under sin.

The Natural Tendency

Now this does not mean that there is nothing good in the natural man, but that his tendency is towards evil. He is a creature of habit, and his habit is bad. He is a slave in the galley, chained to the bench; when his master bids him row, he bends to the oar. This is what is meant by being sold under sin.

The second step is to perceive that we are ransomed in Christ. Jesus said, "The Son of Man is come not to be ministered unto but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many." The ransom for our deliverance was paid on Calvary; as it is written, "Ye are not your own, ye are bought with a price, not with silver and gold, but the precious blood of Jesus, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot." In order to receive the full benefit of this "propitiation for sin" it is necessary that we shall appropriate it, by the exercise of faith; that is, drop the oar, quit the galley and enter into the glorious liberty of the children of God.

The third step is regeneration; which follows an acceptance of Christ. This is the work of the Holy Spirit, and is necessary to our spiritual life; as Jesus said, "Verily I say unto you, except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God." This means more than "turning over a new leaf" or making a good resolution, more than putting on an outward veneering of morality or joining the church; it is a revolutionary change; the getting of a new heart, a new conscience, a new mind, a new purpose. "Old things are passed away, behold, all things are become new."

The fourth step is conflict. This is life-long. Regeneration is only the beginning of life; it does not eradicate the evil in our nature, but fatally wounds it; so that thenceforth there is an unceasing struggle within us. The end, however, is to be seen from the beginning. The better nature is bound to win. The "new man," strenuous by reason of ever increasing life, is constantly getting the better of the "old man" who is stricken with death. Do not suppose that the end of salvation is reached when Christ bends over you saying, "Thy sins be forgiven thee." This is but the tocsin of strife. It is the enlisting, the unfurling the flag, the drawing of the sword. It is related of Hercules that on the day of his birth he strangled two serpents that had been sent by Juno to his cradle to destroy him. But the serpent is our life-long foe. "There is no discharge in this war."

And the fifth step is perfection or glorification. Then a man is rid finally and forever of sin; then he puts on the "fine linen, clean and white," crosses the threshold of heaven and finds himself unabashed in the presence of a holy God.

Now let us return to Paul, and observe how he illustrates these successive steps in his own life and experience. He repeatedly speaks of himself as "the bond-slave of sin," that is, prior to his conversion. He says he was "a blasphemer, a persecutor and injurious." He held a commission from the Sanhedrin as its arch-inquisitor, his business being to hunt down the disciples of Jesus and hale them to judgment and death. In this he was thoroughly honest and wholly wrong; as he says "I verily thought within myself that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus." He was swept onward by an unholy purpose and bound like a galley-slave to do what his master required of him.

Then came the second step in his upward life. On his way to Damascus he heard a voice saying, "I am Jesus, whom thou persecutest!" and smitten with sudden blindness he saw Christ in a new light. He saw the hands that had been wounded for him, stretched forth to proffer the ransom that had been paid for him. The case was proved beyond controversy; insomuch that he was instantly turned, right about face, crying, "Lord, what will thou have me to do?" He was no longer his own man but Christ's man. He was bound, from that moment, to believe what Christ said, to go where Christ sent him and to do what Christ required him to do. The love of Christ constrained him.

Beginning the Journey

The third step was regeneration. This may have occurred at the moment when Christ appeared to him on the Damascus highway or subsequently. On the third day afterward the Lord said to a certain Ananias "Go to such and such a house in the street which is called Straight, and inquire for one called Saul of Tarsus." And when Ananias, trembling, answered "Lord, I have heard by many of this man, how much evil he hath done to thy people!" The Lord said, "Go thy way; Saul is a new man; behold, he prayeth!" By this we understand that the revolutionary change had been wrought by the Spirit of God.

DR. DAVID JAMES BURRELL
PASTOR MARBLE COLLEGIATE CHURCH, NEW YORK

Then came the conflict. In Paul's case it was singularly fierce and unremitting. His writings are full of it: "We wrestle"—"I see a law in my members warring against the law of my mind; for what I would, that do I not, and what I hate, that do I"—"I keep my body under"—"So fight I."

Lifelong Conflict

The parties to this conflict are "the old man, corrupt according to the deceitful lusts," and "the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness." The battle is on and will never cease until the old man is slain and the new man is perfected in the likeness of Christ. "This is hard pounding, gentlemen," as Wellington said at Waterloo. How Paul agonizes! Hear him crying: "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" The thought is of a strangling swimmer, chained to a corpse. But he cannot drown. His deliverance is sure. Hear him: "I thank God, through Jesus Christ our Lord!" And this is the experience of every soul that has been in the thick of the battle with the great Helper beside him.

The final step in the experience of Paul was reached when he laid his head upon the block outside the walls of Rome. In anticipation of that hour he had written: "I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith! Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown." What sort of a crown? "A crown of righteousness!" Thus he passed through heaven's gate, crowned at last, a saint of God.

He was writing now to the Christians of the Ephesian church; and let us observe how he indicates the same upward steps in their experience. He calls their attention to the wicked life of their fellow townsmen, who had "given themselves over to lasciviousness, to work all uncleanness with greediness." And he reminds them that they were once in like manner sold under sin, "walking in the vanity of their mind and alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that was in them."

Then he proceeds to put them in remembrance of what Christ had done in their behalf: how he had died to ransom them from their former sin and misery. The disciples at Ephesus were constant witnesses of the imposing rites and ceremonies and the magnificent games in honor of Diana. Their temptation was to conform their lives to the idolatrous and pleasure-seeking customs of their heathen neighbors. It was easy then, as it is now, to fall into line and keep step with the fashion. But the boundary between the Christian and the pagan life was perfectly clear. There was a difference, and the Christians of Ephesus must be admonished to regard it.

A Moribund Enemy

He emphasizes the fact of their regeneration: "You hath he quickened who were dead in trespasses and sins; wherein in time past ye walked according to the course of this world, according to the prince of the power of the air; but God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us, hath quickened us together with Christ, and hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus." In evidence of this stupendous change he might have recalled the bonfire which they had kindled in the streets of Ephesus, when they had brought their magical books and cabalistic letters and "burned them before all men."

But the thought which he impresses upon them with profoundest emphasis is that of the conflict. This, indeed, is the vital point of his epistle to the Ephesians: "Ye are in the thick of battle! It is the sinful nature against the regenerate nature. It is the old man against the new man. Fight the good fight! Lay hold on eternal life!" In the context he outlines, with much particularity, the character of this "new man," reminding them that they are ever to be "putting off" and "putting on;" putting off the faults of the old man and putting on the graces of the new. The old man is represented as moribund; the process of death is going on continually in him. The new man, on the contrary, is growing more and more into the likeness of Christ, being renewed progressively "after the image of him who created him." The old man is crucified with Christ; the new man lives, lives with ever-growing fullness of life, and the life which he lives is by faith in the Son of God. The old man is wedded to sin and shame; the new man is pledged to holiness. The old man is a hoary reprobate and the sooner he dies the better. The new man is destined to live forever.

The Vigor of the New Man

At this point the Apostle proceeds to indicate the characteristic features of this new man. "Put away lying," he says, "and speak every man truth with his neighbor." He means: Be honest, be candid, free yourself from every form of deception, be transparently true. Froude says: "I have heard thousands of sermons and discourses and homilies on Faith, on the Apostolic Succession, on the Efficacy of the Sacrament: but never during these thirty wonderful years, never that I can recollect, one on that primitive commandment, 'Thou shalt not lie;' yet we have lying all around us, false weights, false measures, and shoddy everywhere." It behooves us who are Christians wholly to unmask and show ourselves before the world as honest men.

> Lord, make me like Thyself,
> Lord, make me be myself;
> Seeming as one who lives to thee,
> And being what I seem to be!

Paul continues, "Be ye angry and sin not;" that is, Add to your truth equanimity. Now there are two sides to Christian equanimity; one side is, Be angry; and the other is, Sin not. It is a man's business to be angry when there is occasion for it. We must ever have a store of holy indignation in reserve. Not long ago a lad of eight years, the son of a rumseller, who had whipped him with a rawhide, ran limping through the street with blood streaming from his wounded face and body. What sort of a Christian man would he be whose gorge did not rise in view of such inhumanity? Be ye angry at all vital and unholy things! Be ye angry at the dramshop and the gambling den, at oppression and corruption everywhere! But sin not. Cherish no grudge. Do no rash thing. Lynch law is as bad as the crime it pun hes. Hate the sin; but wish the sinner well. Be ye igry as Christ was; whose indignation against sin ought him to Calvary, where his last prayer was,

Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do!"
The Apostle proceeds, "Let him that stole, steal no ore; but rather let him labor with his hands, that he ay give to him that needeth." He is not thinking of tty larceny; but of the more radical and pernicious shonesty of the man who assumes that the world owes m a living. Put off your indolence, he says, and put industry. Be a producer, not a consumer only. Add the exchequer of the public good. If you are a fol-wer of the Nazarene Carpenter, see to it that, as beometh the new man created in righteousness and true oliness, you lend yourself to the world's advancement having something to do and doing it well.

Responsibility of Speech

He goes on to say, "Let no corrupt communication roceed out of your mouth, but that which is good to e use of edifying." It is sometimes intimated that aul and James were at odds in their theology; but ere certainly they are at one. It is James who says, f any man among you seemeth to be religious, and idleth not his tongue, but deceiveth his own heart, at man's religion is vain." The tongue is an index of e heart; for out of the abundance of the heart the outh speaketh. The tongue is a little member, but it asteth great things. Behold, we put bits in the horses' ouths that they may obey us, and we turn about their hole body. Behold, also, the ships, which though they e so great and are driven of fierce winds, yet are rned about with a small helm whithersoever the pilot steth. Even so is the tongue among our members; it efileth the whole body and setteth on fire the course of ature."

On one occasion our Lord was asked to heal the infirmities of one who had an impediment in his speech: but before he acquiesced he "lifted his eyes to heaven and sighed:" Why did he sigh? Was it because he knew the great responsibility which he was about to place upon that man in restoring his power of speech? In any case, it is well to remember that wholesome speech is one of the characteristics of the new man in Christ Jesus. And the more our life is developed in Christlikeness, the more do our words come to shine like apples of gold through the meshes of a silver basket.

Then Paul adds, "Let all bitterness and wrath and anger and clamor and evil speaking be put away from you, with all malice: and be ye kind to one another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you." It is related that when Charles V. of France was dying, he said to the heir-apparent, "Kings are only happy when they are doing good." The same is true of all: we are happiest, because most Christlike, when the law of kindness dwells in our hearts and finds expression in our lives.

The Ideal Man

So Paul describes the characteristics of the new man—truth, equanimity, honest industry, wholesome speech and kindness—and he exhorts the Ephesians to busy themselves in "putting off" the opposite faults and putting on these graces, that they may become like Christ. For this is the ultimate, to be like Christ. This is character, sainthood, perfection: I shall be satisfied when I awake in his likeness. Pope defines a Christian as "the highest style of man." The new man in Christ Jesus is the best expression of human character, because he is the nearest approach to Christ himself, the ideal Man.

In view of the foregoing, many of the criticisms which are passed upon the inconsistencies of Christians, lose their point. We do not count ourselves to have apprehended, as though we were already perfect: but we are making a fight for character. If our critics regard this as an easy matter, let them come in and try it.

The best man is not always the one who is outwardly most presentable, but he who, surrounded by his heading sins, as by mortal foes, is striving most hopefully for his life. God knows the hard struggle. Do not flatter yourself that because you find it an easy thing to resist the temptations of corruptness, you are, therefore, approved before God. Remember he looketh on the secret imaginations of the heart. Let the other man, the scarred veteran who, confronted by old haunts like beasts of Ephesus and resisting unto blood, bears the wounds of many a momentary defeat, yet lifts his eyes to heaven and struggles on—let him stand forth to receive the guerdon of spiritual knighthood.

Unending Growth

But the important question for those who are disposed to look askance at imperfect professors is this, Are you sure that you are in the battle at all? Do you realize the importance of it? Are you putting off the old nature and putting on the new? Have you so learned Christ as to esteem character at its true value, as the only thing in the world worth striving for? For this is where the thing begins, in "learning Christ." Do you realize what he has done for you, and what he would have you do for him, and what he would have you be? O, this is what makes life worth living, to make the most of ourselves and do our utmost for others and for God. This is sainthood: to grow toward this is to grow into the likeness of Christ. He who puts up the bravest possible fight and dies with his harness on, will surely reach the stature of a man. And God will give him the new name, which will appropriately designate the new man, as it is written, "To him that overcometh will I give a white stone with a new name written therein, which no man knoweth save he that receiveth it."

mployed. So, too, with dancing. Their servants, who ance for them, must not see them dance.

In the interior, women may yet be found working de by side with men in the field. This was once en-rely customary in districts near large cities. Socially
d industrially, the people are divided into khawany hans or chiefs), and rayats (tenants), who are the very e and backbone of the country. It is the rayat and e members of his household who "tickle the soil with hoe that it may laugh into harvests." As soon as ow disappears from the face of the earth the rayat
d his tribe go forth with shovel and hoe to prepare e ground for seed. Ploughs are drawn by buffaloes, ows, oxen, donkeys, and sometimes,
I have heard, by a woman yoked ith an animal. Wheat is sown in utumn, in April cotton seed, in May ce. Farmers have some pretty cus-
oms. An aged Nestorian lady tells e: "My brother-in-law when ready

Persian ladies of high degree often find time hanging eavily on their hands. The rooms and gardens of the arems bound lives that custom makes too narrow.
here is too much latitude for gossip and idling. Yet eminine industries, tendernesses and amusements bound too. I send a picture of the two daughters of a oble man standing upon a small bridge in their father's arden; the one in the long skirt is attired in semi-Eu-opean dress; the other in Mohammedan costume is, ccording to the game they are playing, showing a Eu-opean lady some hospitable courtesy. No ladies in ersia, of course, lead more luxurious lives than those elated by marriage or otherwise to the Shah and the rown Prince. The caravansary shown in one picture is just to the rear of the palace of the Crown Prince. The Armenian ladies in the picture leading this article, are prosecuting typical home industries: the first, on the left, is spinning; the two next, are knitting; the fourth, is making tape; the little girl at the extreme right, is putting together three strands of thread, making it ready for knitting.

A PERSIAN NOBLEMAN'S LITTLE DAUGHTERS

The superstitions of the people greatly retard their progress. From king to cowboy, this nation is governed by "sneezing." A few hours ago, the servant of one of my patients entered, saying, "Hajy khanim (my lady) was quite ill yesterday; but as I was saddling the horse to come for you, I was taken with sneezing; and we postponed the journey." No matter how urgent a business call may be, if one is taken with sneezing, they say, "It is a bad omen," and defer the journey. The story of the "Martyred Dervish," whose portrait I send, illustrates the point that superstition has retarded Persian progress in art as in industry. He was a musician, and he was killed because he defiled a mosque by playing on his guitar in the holy place.

There was a time, not so long ago, when an Armani (Christian) was not allowed by the Moslems to ride horseback or to share further than they could prevent in privileges enjoyed by themselves. The green color held sacred and worn in the girdles and turbans of the Sayids (descendants of Mohammed) no Christian dared to wear. Henna (the vegetable dye with which they stain lips and nails red, and goolab (attar of roses) were not to be sold to Christians—a prohibition of far less importance than withholding from them medicinal herbs. Christian missionaries, teachers and physicians have, by patient effort, wrought some great changes in the spirit and conduct of the people in such matters.

A few enlightened Mohammedans brave much to send their children to European instructors. Almost every lady can read and write. One whom I was visiting was handed a small triangular green velvet package, with sewed edges. She inspected it, kissed it, laid it on her forehead, opened it reverently—and lo! a letter buried among a lot of rose-leaves! They do not all correspond in written words. I saw a Kurdish chief's love-letter: it was full of beautiful colored drawings of flowers and birds.

The visiting of the sick and destitute is absolutely unheard of among them: this is peculiar to Mohammedan women, the world over, I believe. They do not know of ministry to the afflicted, in the sense that the Christian accepts and applies it. A short while ago, a woman in deep mourning came to me as a patient, and began to tell me of all her ills and misfortunes, one after another. I assured her that she was not very sick. "You will be all right," I advised, "if you will occupy yourself with something that will take your mind out of yourself and off your own troubles. Go visit the poor and sick women; take them tea and sugar; talk with them; listen to their sorrows; cheer them. Carry comfort into bereaved and desolate homes." "O," she cried in horror, "what would people think of me? They would say I atima Khanim is crazy going about visiting the low and mean people." I told her how Christian queens in Europe and ladies of high position in America, go themselves among the poor on missions of mercy, but she could not understand such precedure. "That sort of thing is not customary here," she said. "My husband would not like me to do as you advise. It is all very well to do good, and our Prophet commands it. But there are certain things to be considered. Our Prophet forbids that women should walk too much, or be seen on the street. It would be an unpardonable sin for me to be seen by male relatives of the sick and poor, which might easily happen if I were to visit these people as you suggest. Our blessed Koran," comforted my Mohammedan friend, "requires us to give alms and do good. Last year, I sent a poor man to our holy Mecca, paying all his expenses. I can send gifts to the poor people you speak of, but for a lady in my position to visit them is out of the question." It is Christianity's mission to give Persian women higher occupations, by teaching them the beauty of service. In the passing of the lazy dervish mendicants and the coming of Christian missionaries, lies a new hope for Oriental womanhood.

Drawing-Room Talks

By MRS. MARGARET BOTTOME

CHRIST holds two receptions—one now, and the other in the future. Unless we accept the invitation to the first reception, we shall not be at the second. To the first reception, only one class is invited; if we are not in that class, we are not expected, and will not be received. Nothing could be plainer than the words of the invitation; even his enemies spoke the truth about this: "This man receiveth sinners." This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation. "Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." "I came not to call the righteous." People who think they are good, and that they are not sinners, need not apply. Make no mistake here; "sinners" Jesus came to save. You need not have committed any outward crime, but in the sight of God and in your own sight, of your own conscience, if spiritual eyes have been opened, you know you are a sinner, so you have an invitation to Christ's first reception. I am glad that the first hymn that my childish ears listened to was

Let not conscience make you linger,
Nor of fitness fondly dream;
All the fitness He requireth
Is to feel your need of Him.

As a child, I presented myself at the altar in the church as a sinner needing a Saviour. There are a good many new isms these days, and some of them leave out even the words "sinner" and "Saviour." Well, according to the New Testament (and I am not as yet prepared to give up the New Testament)—I haven't seen anything yet to be compared with it—those who are not sinners and do not need a Saviour are not invited to Christ's first reception. If we come to this in answer to his invitation, he will take us and save us from all that would prevent our attendance at his second reception. That will be the great event of all this world's history.

The reception will take place before an assembled universe. Hear these words: "Now unto Him that is able to keep you from falling and to present you faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy. To the only wise God, our Saviour, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and ever." Amen.

You present yourself as a sinner at his first reception, and accept him as your Saviour. He presents you faultless at his second, with exceeding joy. No wonder he will have exceeding joy in presenting you a perfectly saved sinner—faultless. This word "faultless" to my mind is reserved till then. He makes us "blameless" in his sight, but "blameless" and "faultless" are two very different words. This distinction between blamelessness and faultlessness came to me years ago through a dear child of mine, who later grew to manhood and who is now in heaven. He was a very little boy, but he always wanted to help me. I was tacking down a carpet. He said:

"Mamma, can't I help you?" and looked up as if he did so want to be of use. I answered: "Yes, you can; hold the tacks"; so I gave him the saucer with the tacks in it. He was so delighted to be helping me, that he upset the saucer and spilled all my tacks on the floor. Did I tell him he had hindered me? Not at all! I thanked him for assistance. He was blameless, but not faultless—he had shown love, and love always helps; it was truth to say he "helped me"; he had served my heart—he loved me, and wanted to help me—my beautiful, blameless boy. I shall see him some day presented "faultless."

Between the two receptions is the time when we are being made fit for the presentation by Christ himself as "faultless." We must see we grow in grace by reason of all we pass through, profiting by our trial and suffering. The Captain of our salvation was made perfect through suffering, and the servant is not above his Lord. We must not shrink; we must say: "This means the perfecting of my character; and the cup which my Father hath given me to drink, shall I not drink it?"

This is the meaning of life. The meaning of "death oft"—the meaning of the thorns of life, hiding eyes among the roses. We must keep our eyes on the glory to be revealed—on what we are going to be. We will come to where we shall rejoice in tribulation. All things work together for our perfect preparation for the Bridal Reception. Let us not lose sight of our glorious destiny as the Bride of Christ—His second reception will be a wonderful Easter wedding.

I do not know where my mother ever learned the quaint old lines, that I can still hear her sing as she rocked her babies to sleep:

How beauteous are the garments,
The bride of Christ doth wear,
He adorns her with his presence,
And feeds her with his care.
He decks her with rich jewels,
And crowns her with his love,
And by his mighty power,
He'll bear her safe above.

THE CHURCH AND THE WORLD

A TIMELY ALLEGORY

THE Church and the World walked far apart
On the changing shore of time;
The World was singing a giddy song,
And the Church a hymn sublime.
"Come, give me your hand," said the merry World,
"And walk with me this way,"
But the good Church hid her snowy hand,
And solemnly answered—"Nay.

"I will not give thee my hand at all,
And I will not walk with you;
Your way is the way of eternal death,
And your words are all untrue."
"Nay, walk with me a little space,"
Said the World with a kindly air,
"The road I walk is a pleasant road,
And the sun shines always there;

"Your way is narrow and thorny and rough,
While mine is flowery and smooth;
Your lot is sad with reproach and toil,
But in rounds of joy I move.
My way, you can see, is a broad, fair one,
And my gate is high and wide;
There is room enough for you and me,
And we'll travel side by side."

"Come, give me your hand," said the merry World, "and walk with me this way"

Half shyly the Church approached the World,
And gave him her hand of snow;
And the false World grasped it, and walked along,
And whispered in accents low,
"Your dress is too simple to please my taste;
I have gold and pearls to wear;
Rich velvets and silks for your graceful form,
And diamonds to deck your hair."

The Church looked down at her plain white robes,
And then at the dazzling World,
And blushed as she saw his handsome lip,
With a smile contemptuous curled.
"I will change my dress for a costlier one,"
Said the Church with a smile of grace;
Then her pure white garments drifted away,
And the World gave in their place

Beautiful satins, and shining silks,
And roses and gems and pearls;
And over her forehead her bright hair fell
Waving in thousand curls.
"Your house is too plain," said the proud, bold World,
"Let me build you one like mine,
With kitchen for feasting and parlor for play,
And furniture never so fine."

So he built her a costly and beautiful house—
Splendid it was to behold; [there,
Her sons and her daughters met frequently
Shining in purple and gold.
And fair and festival—frolics untold,
Were held in the place of prayer;
And maidens bewitching as sirens of old—
With world-winning graces rare.

Bedecked with fair jewels and hair all curled,
Untrammeled by Gospel or Laws, [World
To beguile and amuse and win from the
Some help for the righteous cause.
The Angel of Mercy rebuked the Church,
And whispered, "I know thy sin;"
Then the Church looked sad, and anxiously longed
To gather the children in.

But some were away at the midnight ball,
And others were at the play;
And some were drinking in gay saloons,
And the Angel went away.
Then said the World in soothing tones,
"Your loved ones mean no harm—
Merely indulging in innocent sports,"
So she leaned on his proffered arm.

She smiled, and chatted, and gathered flowers
And walked along with the World;
While countless millions of precious souls
To the horrible pit were hurled
"Your preachers are all too old and plain,"
Said the gay World with a sneer;
"They frighten my children with dreadful tales,
Which I do not like them to hear.

"The Father is merciful, great and good,
Loving and tender and kind;
Do you think he'd take one child to heaven,
And leave another behind?"
So she called for pleasing and gay divines—
Deemed gifted, and great, and learned;
And the plain old men that preached the Cross
Were out of her pulpits turned.

"You give too much to the poor," said the World,
"Far more than you ought to do;
Though the poor need shelter, food and clothes,
Why thus need it trouble you?"
So the poor were turned from the door in scorn,
She heard not the orphans' cry
And she drew her beautiful robe aside
As the widows went weeping by.

And they of the Church, and they of the World,
Walked closely, hand and heart,
And none but the Master, who knoweth all
Could discern the two apart. [said
Then the Church sat down at her ease and
"I'm rich, and in goods increased;
I have need of nothing, and naught to do,
But to laugh and dance and feast."

The sly World heard her and laughed within
And mockingly said aside, [Church—
"The Church has fallen — the beautiful
Her shame is her boast and pride."
Then the Angel drew near the mercy-seat,
And whispered in sighs her name, [hushed
And the saints their anthems of rapture
And covered their heads with shame.

BLOCK HOUSE AND CITY GATE — GENERAL VIEW OF NEW AMSTERDAM, 1639–1640 — FERRY TO LONG ISLAND

1653 New York's Municipal Anniversary 1903

FROM May 24 to May 30, 1903, New York City will hold the most unique patriotic celebration in its history. It will be in honor of the 250th anniversary of the establishment of New York, then called New Amsterdam, as a municipality under a charter granted by the Dutch West India Company. It was not much of a charter, for it gave very little to the people, but it was, like New Amsterdam itself, the small beginning of a great municipal organization, which to-day exceeds in its yearly expenditure the combined annual expenditures of several European kingdoms, and has a revenue from municipal taxation far exceeding the total revenue of Holland, the country from which the founders of New Amsterdam originally came. The celebration, as planned, will be in all respects worthy of the memorable anniversary. The anniversary day was February 2, 1903; but it was deemed better to have the celebration in the more genial season of May. President Roosevelt, himself a native of New York, is expected to be among the invited guests, together with the members of his Cabinet, who hold portfolios which existed when the government of the United States was located in New York, to wit: the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Attorney-General and the Postmaster-General. State and local officials will, of course, take part, and General James Grant Wilson will deliver a historical address in the Chamber of the Board of Aldermen. There will be a general display of flags during the entire week of the celebration, special exercises will be conducted in every school, and pastors will be requested, in their various houses of worship, to call the attention of their congregations to the event, and to invoke the Divine blessing on the municipality. Every day of the celebration lectures will be delivered in the public schools and other buildings, upon the history and growth of the city, and at these lectures hundreds of old prints, illustrating the New Amsterdam and New York of the past, will be reproduced as stereopticon slides. The same slides will be used, in connection with magic lanterns, for street displays in as many public squares of the city as may be practicable, and public concerts will be given.

New York has a history well worth the telling, and it has a religious side of exemplary interest. The first settlers of the island of Manhattan were Walloons, who had taken refuge in Holland from the relentless persecution to which they were subjected by the Spaniards, on account of their Protestantism. When they landed, on a beautiful May morning in 1623, they gave thanks to God for their safety, and implored the divine blessing on their future home. A church, with a double roof, was among the earliest buildings erected, and "the tapping of beer" was forbidden during the hours of divine service. A fine was imposed for taking the name of God in vain. All servile labor was forbidden on the Lord's Day, and while religious observance was not as strict as in the New England colonies, the Gospel was deep-rooted among the emigrants of New Amsterdam. Professed Christians of to-day, who think it a hard matter to go a short distance to church, may perhaps take a lesson from the Huguenot settlers of New Rochelle, who, before they had a church of their own, walked to New York every Saturday and Sunday to attend divine worship. They started on Saturday morning, going all that day, and resting for the night in the suburb called "Stuyvesant Village," near where the Bible House now stands, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is published. On Sunday morning they started again, and walked down to the French church on Pine street, reaching there in time for the services.

When New Amsterdam was chartered as a city, it was already fated to pass under English rule, and a few years later a large part of the Dutch settlements on Long Island were brought within English jurisdiction. In 1664, New Amsterdam surrendered to the English, and in 1665 it received a city government, somewhat like that of to-day, with a mayor, aldermen and sheriff. With this latter date real civic government began.

In 1664, the population of New Amsterdam was about fifteen hundred—it was certainly much less when the charter of 1653 was granted—probably not over 1,000, including negroes. To-day New York City has a population approaching four millions. In that early period, the Dutch West India Company complained that the whole colony of New Netherland, including, of course, New Amsterdam, yielded the Company not more than fifty thousand guilders a year. To-day, there are many single buildings in New York yielding several times that amount in rents. The schoolmaster of 1653 appears also to have been bell-ringer, grave-digger, court-messenger, chorister, and general factotum to the magistrates. The New York of to-day has a public school system unsurpassed in excellence by any other city of the world. The double-roofed church in the New Amsterdam fort, is succeeded by hundreds of churches and chapels accommodating vast multitudes of worshippers, and proving that the faith in Christ of the exiles of 250 years ago, is potent in the city of to-day

Proposed Peace Treaties

FROM the French capital comes news of a movement, which should awaken hearty sympathy in this country. It is an attempt to translate into active operation the principles of the Peace Conference at the Hague. About a hundred members of the French Chamber of Deputies have organized a league to promote international arbitration. They recognize the fact, which is obvious to every observer of statecraft the world over, that there is a disposition to regard the decisions of the Conference as purely academic and theoretic. Kings and Emperors and Generals are disposed to proceed in the same old barbarous way, relying on armies for the maintenance of their power. There is no sign in any cabinet of disarmament, but rather a vigorous endeavor to increase the efficiency of armies and navies, and to acquire the most destructive means of warfare. Yet, at the Hague, the representatives of the twenty-six most powerful nations of the world, constituted a Court of Arbitration, and with all formality and ceremony, agreed to recommend to their respective governments the submission to the Court of all matters of dispute. The French deputies are engaging in an effort to hold them to their pledge. They are urging the preparation of treaties specifying definitely the matters of possible dispute, which shall be submitted to the Hague Court whenever they may arise. If such treaties were framed, and properly presented to the various governments, it is difficult to see how they could logically avoid signing them. The deputies have decided to urge their own government to take the initiative in this movement. It may be hoped that they will succeed, and that similar success may attend the effort to get the Powers pledged to arbitration. No treaty could be framed that would cover every possible cause for dispute, but it will be a long step ahead to have some of the most probable causes eliminated from the sphere of the sword.

A Notable Anniversary

NEW YORK is now busily preparing for the enthusiastic celebration, a few weeks hence, of her two hundred and fiftieth year of municipal existence. In the most public manner, by lectures, illuminations and other means, the romance of the young colony's early history will be impressed upon the minds of the vast cosmopolitan population in the metropolis, a very considerable proportion of whom, being ignorant on the subject, would otherwise be unable to appreciate the meaning of the celebration. To these multitudes, representing almost every known nationality and all shades of religious opinion, it might seem, at first, that the coming anniversary would possess little interest. But this is not the case. They have the keenest and most eager interest in all that relates to national progress —political, social, intellectual and religious. And specially do they value the precious privilege of religious liberty, which America gives to all her children.

It is in this connection that the anniversary at hand may be said to possess a peculiar interest. Among the settlers in the young colony of New Amsterdam, besides the adherents of the Dutch Church, were French Protestants (known as Walloons), Huguenots, Lutherans, Baptists, and a few Catholics. Under Peter Minuit's rule, and even under Van Twiller, religious toleration prevailed, and all who took the oath of allegiance were on equal footing. Attracted by this absolute freedom of worship, thither came not a few exiles from the Puritan colonies in New England, among them Roger Williams, Anne Hutchinson and others, who had fled "for conscience sake," and to avoid persecution. Even those good old Dutch preachers, Dominie Jonas Michaelius, whose first church was a loft over a horse-mill, and Dominie Everardus Bogardus, who expounded the Word in a stout wooden building, from whose pulpit he delivered vigorous blows at Satan on Sundays, were tolerant of other religionists, who either held services of their own or none at all. They kept a vigilant watch over their own flock during the week, and on Sundays did not hesitate, when occasion demanded, to rebuke even the Director-General. Van Twiller is said to have more than once writhed under the sturdy eloquence of Dominie Bogardus, who was one of the most fearless and outspoken preachers of early Colonial days. Their successors, Dominies Megapolensis and Dresius, were men of narrower views, who, though faithful and conscientious, were rather disposed to stir up bigotry than to preach a Gospel of love and peace.

Under Stuyvesant's rule, the little colony gradually felt the autocratic powers of the Director-General being more rigidly enforced. Religious toleration, too, was in danger, and although the Dutch West India Company had explicitly instructed that "all be allowed the free exercise of their religion in their own houses," the Lutherans, the Baptists, and especially the Quakers, were subjected to harsh persecutions, and some even to fines, punishment and banishment. At this time, many other nationalities besides Hollanders were represented in New Amsterdam, and one historian tells us that "eighteen languages were spoken on Manhattan Island." Stuyvesant's administration had become so despotic that a movement for radical reform spread rapidly among all classes, Dutch included, probably no less on account of the Director-General's religious intolerance, than his antagonism to popular feeling in other matters. Adrian Van der Donck went to Holland as the advocate of this reform, and presented it with an ability that did much toward bringing about the great change, by which, under the first municipal charter, "modelled after the ancient charter of Amsterdam," New Amsterdam, in 1653, attained local self-government. Van der Donck, during that memorable trip to Holland, wrote a little pamphlet, which was widely distributed throughout the Continent of Europe, and in which he pictured in enthusiastic terms, the material prosperity and religious liberty of the colonists.

Immediately thereafter, immigrants began to arrive in large numbers from different countries: Waldenses from Italy, Huguenots from France, Lutherans from Germany and Sweden, Independents from England; Scottish Presbyterians, Moravians, Anabaptists, and even Jews (says Wilson, the historian), and between 1653 and 1664 the population of New Amsterdam doubled. There were occasional outbreaks of bigotry, but these were sharply and effectively rebuked by the Dutch Chamber.

Such was the religious condition of New Amsterdam at the time it became a municipality, and when the only substantial place of worship it possessed was a stout stone building within the walls of the fort. It is recorded that the first hundred guilders for this church were subscribed by David De Vries, a worthy burgher, who, having visited the New England colonies and seen their handsome churches, felt ashamed of the shabby wooden structure in New Amsterdam, where the Walloons and Dutch were wont to worship. To one who counts the hundreds of spires pointing heavenward to-day on what was once the site of New Amsterdam—a varied host of temples, but all for the worship of the same Father—the contrast must bring the conviction that the seed of religious freedom, planted and watered by those sturdy burghers in 1653, has thriven and multiplied apace.

Humble Service

SOME of the metropolitan newspapers, a few days ago, printed a touching incident, which told how a lady, riding in her carriage along one of the crowded streets, observed an aged pedestrian fall heavily on the slippery roadway. She immediately descended from her carriage, and, kneeling in the mud, held the poor man's head upon her lap, and comforted him with words of kindness and sympathy until the arrival of an ambulance. A wondering crowd stood by, astonished to see the lady do such an unusual thing. Some said it was an unprecedented act; others remarked that her dress was ruined; a few praised her good-heartedness; but not one came forward to help her. Like the Levite in the parable, they passed by "on the other side."

We must be content to take the hands even of beggars, if we are to make the blind to see. Sympathy is never sweet or helpful when it is reached down with a long arm. It must be at close range. If it is to do any good, it must go straight out horizontally, from heart to heart.

Father Taylor, the famous sailor preacher of Boston, was a wonderfully practical man. During his last illness, a friend who came in one day, said to him, in sentimental sort of way, that no doubt the angels we about him. "I don't want angels," blurted out the blu high-hearted old warrior; "I want folks. Folks a better than angels." It was a strong but not irrevere statement, and enfolds a gospel truth. Paul thank God that Jesus Christ took not on him the nature angels, but took on him the seed of Abraham. Th which makes Jesus Christ so dear to the heart of ma kind, rich and poor, the whole world round, is that took upon himself our nature, and lived as one of us in all points made like unto his brethren. The myste of the Incarnation, and the meaning of it, is simp this: He put out his hand—not stretched it down, b put it out—and touched humanity in its misery a ruin, just as he took the blind beggar by the hand.

If we would follow in His footsteps, we, too, must n be afraid or ashamed, though our path lead us into t humblest quarters, or bring us into contact with t very poorest and the weakest. That service from whi the whole world selfishly shrinks, is often the one whi the Christian should most quickly and gladly perfor

The Kaiser Criticized

AN interesting contribution to the discussion whi is agitating the religious public in Germany, ane the Kaiser's relations with Prof. Delitzsch is made Prof. Harnack. No name probably in all German th ological circles commands so much respect as his, and may be predicted that this latest emanation will increa the esteem in which he is held. It is a delicate duty reprove royalty, especially royalty which holds the th ory of the divine right of kings; but Prof. Harnack h done it with so much tact that the Emperor, unless is very shrewd, will not be conscious of the severity the blows.

Prof. Harnack says there is great force in the distir tion that the Emperor draws between the revelati that is general and that which is directly religious. I goes on, however, after administering the honey, to gi the unpalatable medicine. "There are not two reve tions at all," he says. "Religion and knowledge are t closely interwoven for that." But the bearers of t revelation are diverse in character, vocation and missic Nothing is lost to Christ by placing him in line wi Moses, Isaiah and the Psalmists, any more than comparing him with the secular teachers cited by t Emperor—Socrates and Plato. In this all Christendo will agree with the Professor. Christ is so superior them each and all, that we realize his majesty a grandeur all the more clearly when these lesser en nences are in the line of sight. The Professor sa rightly that, "the Christian community is bound to pudiate every estimate of Jesus which effaces the d ference between him and all other teachers." He ad to this emphatic statement a word of practical couns for which he deserves the thanks and applause of Chr tians of every name. "It is more important," he say "to ponder those words of Jesus, 'By this shall all m know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to a other,' and to order our lives in conformity with the than to contend with one another in the attempt press the venerable and inscrutable into formulas How much of theological rancor and unchristian ac bity the world might be saved by heeding Prof. Ha nack's timely admonition!

Remembering Old Sins

PERHAPS you can see them now as you look ba into your past, — words and deeds of guil thoughtlessness, if not of wanton wickedness.

A poor, humble Christian died weeping over the collection of old sins. The nurse dried the tear-w eyes, and as the last breath left the body, and the pul fluttered no more, wiped them again, and withdrew some other duty. When she returned to the bedsi she called the attention of a visitor to another tear the cheek of the dead. Life had been extinct for so minutes; but the water gathered in the eye had dropp on the cheek in that last tear—a sacred token of god sorrow for sins forever past.

Only a life of love and well-doing plants no thorns the dying pillow.

DETAILS received by mail, supplement the cable story published in this journal on April 8, of the expedition which has gone in arch of the South Pole. They show that e explorers have had a most arduous perience, and have encountered terrible ngers. Soon after settling their quars, they sent up a balloon, but, even at great height, found the horizon enclosed lofty mountains. The sledge journey mmenced in September, which is the ring season in those latitudes, occupi- ninety-four days. After the explorers d left a depot, which had been previsly established sixty miles to the south the ship, the snow became soft, and it as almost impossible to drag the sledges ng. Half of the dges had to be uled five miles, and en the party returnd and brought up the mainder: each five iles covered thus, volving fifteen iles traveling. This lay work lasted venty-nine days. he explorers estabished a depot in laude 80° 30′ south. ere they discarded superfluous gear, d set out from the epot on December for a dash to the outh. As they proeeded, the snow beame softer, and the xtra strain told uickly upon the ogs, which ultimate- all died. They enetrated to latitude 9° 17′—the farthest oint yet reached by ny explorer—about ve hundred and fifty iles from the Pole. The return journey as still more trying. Thick fogs envelped them, and for five days the party had o steer a course practically in the dark. hen they had to go on short rations, and o add to their difficulties, Lieutenant hackleton burst a blood vessel in one of is lungs. Such were the hardships of the ledge work on the various journeys made y the Discovery's men, that they are deribed by the officers of the Morning as eing palpably aged, though nevertheless ell and cheerful. Forty-one men in all emained to continue their explorations. ieut. Shackelton and nine men, all of hom had suffered in the severe climate, eturned home on the Morning, as the hysician in charge believed that another inter in those conditions would endanger heir lives. The Discovery, a picture of hich is here given, remains with the xplorers for their return journey. She is escribed as a stanch vessel, well-fitted or the work of exploration. It is, however, clear that if the explorers succeed in heir object, it will be by sledges. Even n the summer, the vessel could not safely roceed farther south. The heroic band re aware of this fact, but are not daunted y the stupendous difficulties before them. Their courage and endurance are marvelous. If men will suffer such hardships, and expose themselves to such dangers, in order to solve a scientific problem, what kind of consecrated service ought the cause of Christ to inspire in those who bear his name?

Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown, but we an incorruptible title (I. Cor. 9: 25).

vessel in the world, was launched on April 17, at New London, Conn. The Minnesota can stow away in her cavernous holds 28,000 tons dead weight, and, in her superstructure, reserved for passengers, she can carry nearly 2,700 persons, including 172 first cabin, 110 second cabin and 68 third cabin voyagers. As a transport she could accommodate ten regiments. The Minnesota's dimensions are: Length, 630 feet; breadth, 73½ feet, moulded depth, 56 feet. Her great depth and beam enable her to beat the world afloat as a carrier. She was not built for speed. Her triple expansion engines, turning twin propellers 20 feet in diameter, are intended to drive her at the rate of 14 knots in pleasant weather. The new ship bristles with cargo booms. There are thirty-four of them, two being fitted to lift fifty tons. Some of the hatches are large enough to admit a locomotive or a freight car. She can carry a cargo that would fill a railroad train seven miles long, or 125 trains of twenty cars each. The big ship was begun in March, 1901. In one month 2,000 tons of material were put into the Minnesota and her sister ship the Dakota. The cost of building these two Pacific liners was about $5,000,000. The construction of such ships is a sign of the stupendous development of our commerce. We have a right to rejoice that our nation is taking so prominent a place among the nations of the world; but we ought also to be careful that in our prosperity we do not forget what is the true source of national greatness.

A Miser's Hoard

For some days past, a miserable man, eighty-two years old, had been missed by people living near Belvidere, N. J., who for many years have been used to see him going about the town, eagerly getting a few pennies whenever he could, to buy him food. Inquiries were made about him, and finally a man who knew where he lived went to see what had happened. His home was a miserable hovel in the woods in a wild, mountainous district called Harker's Hollow. Entering the hut, the old man was seen sitting dead in his chair. The single room was inexpressibly filthy. It contained only one chair, a trunk which served as a table, and a wretched mattress which was used as a bed. The authorities were notified, and they searched the hovel to find it there was any clue to the old man's relatives. When they broke open the trunk they found a pile of bank bills, some of them covered with mold and almost unrecognizable. Next they tore apart the bedding, and out of the collection of old rags fell coins of gold and silver. In an old lard can under some musty flour was a bag of silver. In the weather boards, in the chimney, under the rafters—in fact, wherever the men searched, they found money concealed. Papers partly filled up showed that the old man had begun arrangements for entering a home for aged and destitute persons. There was a memorandum of the address of his sister in New York, and she was notified of the death. She had heard nothing of her brother in many years. The old man had died in poverty and squalor in spite of his riches, for his disposition would not allow him to make use of his money, and therefore he was to all intents and purposes a poor man.

There is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty (Prov. 11: 24).

Dr. Lorenz's Patient

The great Viennese surgeon is again in this country. He returned to remove the plaster cast which he placed, six months ago, on the body of Mr. Armour's little daughter. She had been suffering from congenital dislocation of the hip, and had been unable to walk. Dr. Lorenz put the member in place, and then enclosed it in the plaster cast to keep it there. The child and her parents have passed the interval in intense anxiety, for not until the cast was removed, could it be known whether the operation had been successful. On the arrival of Dr Lorenz, he took a penknife, and opened the cast. It came away easily, and without pain to the little patient. Then the good doctor gave her his hand, and to the joy of all present, she tripped easily across the room. Her mother almost fainted with delight as she clasped in her arms the child who had been crippled from birth, and saw her walk as other children. "Oh! I am so happy!" said the child. "See, mamma, how I can walk now!" How thankful her parents must be to the skilful surgeon who has removed the deformity and enabled their child to walk like other children. We may hope that they will seek for her the help of the divine Physician who can do infinitely more for her happiness.

He restoreth my soul: he leadeth me in the paths of righteousness (Ps. 23: 3).

A Wife's Responsibility

The Appellate Court of New York has just decided a case which has been pending in the lower courts for a long time and has been watched with deep interest. It was a suit brought by a dry-goods firm against a wealthy man for goods supplied to his wife after she had separated from him. Justice Ingraham, in giving the decision of the Court, said: "If a wife, without cause, deserts her husband and refuses to live with him and to accept the support which he is willing and able to give her, the separation ends any implied authority based upon the marriage for the wife to make contracts upon the credit of the husband, or liability of the husband for necessaries furnished to the wife. It has never been held, so far as I know, that a wife could voluntarily and without cause leave her husband, repudiating her obligations that she incurred upon her marriage, and then compel the husband to support her separated from him, and it has duty to his wife is performed when he offers to support her in accordance with his means and station in life when living with him, she has no implied authority to purchase the things necessary for her support from others and make her husband liable." The principle enunciated by the judge is too often forgotten in spiritual matters. People have no right to expect the rights and privileges of their position when they neglect its duties. There are many who hope to enter heaven when they die, though they live away from Christ and do not love, honor or obey him.

If we deny him, he also will deny us (II Tim. 2: 12).

BRIEF NOTES

Capt. Eugene T. Wilson, of the Artillery Corps, at Fort Liscum, Alaska, reports that the abolition of the canteen has had a great influence on the men. It has been followed by a decrease of drunkenness, their being now no occasion for restraint formerly exercised.

An important Sunday School campaign is now going on in North Carolina under the auspices of the State Sunday School Association. The Executive Committee has sent out a Field Party to cover the entire State. It is composed of Prof. S. M. Smith, of Lenoir College; Mr. [illegible] Furman, of New York; Rev. [illegible], of Marietta, Ga.; and Rev. [illegible], of Montreat, N. C. These brethren are [illegible] in their respective counties, and [illegible] perfection in all kinds of Sunday School work. The work is interdenominational, and is starting up greater interest in Sunday School [illegible] in all denominations.

Crowned Heads Praise American Benevolence

KING CHRISTIAN

CROWN PRINCE FREDERICK

THE CROWN PRINCE AND FAMILY

PRINCE WALDEMAR

PRINCE HAROLD

FOUR generations were in the family party gathered in the Royal Palace at Copenhagen recently, to celebrate the eighty-fifth birthday of King Christian IX. of Denmark. Dr. Klopsch's cablegram, published in our issue last week, shows how democratic and genial a party it was. The king has six children—three sons and three daughters. Some of these are already grandparents, and the little children were not the least delightful and welcome of the guests. Seven of them are grandchildren of the Crown Prince. The Queen of England, the king's eldest daughter, the beloved Alexandra, has also seven grandchildren, and the dowager Empress of Russia, the king's second daughter, has eight. Every year the patriarchal king delights to gather under his roof as many of his descendants as possible, and it is their joy to accept his invitation. During the life of the late Emperor of Russia, Alexander III., he was a regular visitor to the home of his father-in-law. There he laid aside the cares of State and was the most light-hearted and joyous member of the family circle. The tradesmen of Copenhagen still tell stories of his boisterous mirth and of the pleasure he took in loading his nephews and nieces with presents. His death was mourned nowhere more sincerely than in the Danish capital. Another vacant place in the circle is that of the venerated Queen Louise, who took no less delight than her husband in these annual reunions of their numerous descendants. It is now five years since, at the age of eighty-one, she passed away.

Few royal couples have been so devoted to one another and to their family as were the King and Queen of Denmark. When they began their married life in 1842, there seemed little prospect that they would ever reach a throne. Christian was Prince of Schleswig-Holstein-Glucksburg, and it was not until ten years later that the European Powers, concerned over the fact that the reigning King of Denmark had no direct heir, assembled in London and selected Christian as his successor.

In 1863, or about eleven years afterwards, King Frederick died and Prince Christian succeeded. Prior to that time, his income had been so small that the utmost economy was necessary. He lived plainly at home, entering but little into society. His wife loyally aided him, and kept the household expenses down to a minimum. She trained her three daughters in domestic habits, and even taught them how to make their own garments. It is said that they were able to rival the court milliners in skill, and were adepts in all household duties. Nor were accomplishments neglected. They acquired several languages and were musicians of no mean order.

Even now, the king, who is passionately fond of music, has no higher enjoyment when his daughters are under the paternal roof than to set them playing on the old piano. Best of all, they were sweet, good, lovable women, sympathetic with poverty and suffering, and kind and considerate to their attendants. That these traits of character have not been lost, in spite of the illustrious stations they have occupied, is evident from Dr. Klopsch's cablegram. He says that the Queen and Empress were moved to tears as he described to them the scenes of suffering he had witnessed in his tour of the famine-stricken districts of Finland. They cordially appreciated, too, the generous relief sent from America, and as he explained how many a gift had been rendered possible only by the self-denial and self-sacrifice of the givers, the two ladies exclaimed: "God bless and reward them." The Queen of England, as was natural, was especially interested in the relief of the famine in India, and was charmed by the explanation of the system, by which the five thousand famine orphans in that land are being fed, clothed, and educated at the expense of generous Christian people in America. She desired Dr. Klopsch to tender to every one of those foster parents her sincerest gratitude, as Empress of that afflicted land.

OUR RELIEF WORK IN FINLAND

Having completed his extended famine tour in the Northland, Dr. Louis Klopsch, the Editor of this journal, is now returning to the United States. He writes that the tour has been a severe trial of physical endurance. "The tremendous distances of the houses from one another—rarely less than five miles, and frequently twelve or fifteen miles—the dull, leaden sky, with scarcely a ray of sunshine; the unpalatable food, the monotonous landscape, and the many inconveniences, have contributed to rack us physically, nervously, mentally. On his arrival, he will present, through these pages, the story of his famine experiences, which it has been impracticable to do while the journey was in progress.

THE DOWAGER EMPRESS OF RUSSIA AND QUEEN ALEXANDRA

OUR FINLAND RELIEF PARTY DISCUSSING PLANS FOR THE TOUR

The following report of what has been accomplished with aid furnished from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund, in a number of villages around Kajana is typical of the character of the work done by Dr. Klopsch in many localities in Finland.

Dear Sir:—In remembrance of you, and of the good work you have done for us and numerous other suffering families in our unhappy land, we feel that we owe you thanks, more thanks than we can find words for. The world knows very little about us and our sufferings. We are living in our wide forests, among snow and ice. Generation after generation we have struggled and suffered, and many have died for lack of the commonest necessaries, unknown to the world. Such was like to have been our own lot in this year of need. But you heard of it. You made it known to the world. You and your good readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD began great relief work for us, and it has proved admirably ample. You did more than that; you came over to see us and our need. You suffered much, struggling through waist-deep snows to our cottages, in order to help us, and to bring a ray of light and joy to us in our hopeless situation.

We thank you for your beneficent work, for your visit, and for the help you brought us and our poor children, and we ask you to convey to the American people our warmest regards and thanks. God bless you and all our American friends!

Our Consul General in Sweden sends this voluntary testimony to the value of the American relief work in that country:

My dear Dr. Klopsch:

The enclosed card came to this office for you, and knowing you would be pleased to receive it, I forward it. With it I send my sincere regards and good wishes, and my echo of the grateful expressions of the people of Sweden, for the perfect manner in which you fulfilled your noble mission to the suffering districts of the famine-stricken north.

Most cordially and respectfully,

EDWARD L. ADAMS,
U. S. Consul-General.

Among the contributions received during the past week was the following:

SAVINGS LOAN AND TRUST COMPANY,
MADISON, WIS., April 10,

Editor The Christian Herald:—Enclosed find check for $536.65 for the famine-stricken people of Finland. The money has come in my hands as the result of a proclamation appeal by our Governor, R. M. LaFollette, some weeks ago. The appeal was for Finland, Sweden and Norway, and the amount has been divided as per understanding with the Governor. Kindly own receipt in accordance with the above. HALLE STEENSLAND Swedish and Norwegian Vice-Consul.

Contributions in aid of both Finland and Sweden, may be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York, to be forwarded to the committees in Helsingfors and Stockholm. Contributors should state clearly for which country the gifts are intended. All gifts will be duly acknowledged in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The Girl who Failed

"YOU do not mean to tell me that Lena failed?"

"Well, not exactly failed, Ida, but she missed the goal."

"I am surprised," was the answer. "There is no one in the class better qualified to take the prize. What could Lena have been about to have allowed it?"

Lena, the subject of this conversation, was in her room, busily packing her trunks to return home. Many of the girls had already left the institution; tearful good-byes had been said, and vows of eternal friendship exchanged. It had been a year of pleasant memories and hard work, and now the uncertainty was all over, there was not even the commencement day left to look forward to. There was a happy smile on Lena's face, although she paused now and then to brush the tears from her eyes. "I do not see why here I am ever going to put them all," she said. "What, dear," her room-mate asked quizzingly, "your dresses?"

A merry laugh greeted the words. "Well, hardly," she said. "It's these keepsakes, I mean: I'm cramming them into every conceivable corner, but still the problem baffles me."

"That's the penalty you pay for being popular. Really, I thought I should give the college all this morning, when cook gave you that locktie. I just got a glimpse of it, it looked as if the colors of the rainbow had been struck off."

"Oh, Dora, hush! That gift must have meant a good deal to cook, and I appreciate the thought."

"Well, don't forget your diploma, anyway, here it is. Lena, what a queer girl you are! Excuse me for repeating myself, I think I have said the same thing fifty times before."

"I think you have, dear; but why do you say it?"

"Why do I say it? Oh, because in this intellectual race you were the swiftest runner of them all; but stopped to wipe away tears, to bind up wounds, and to spend your hours in loving, Christ-like service. Don't say a word," she demonstrated, as Lena lifted a warning hand, "I mean to finish what I have to say, if only to believe my own mind. Right in the midst of preparing for that advanced geometry examination, didn't you stop and spend several hours with Lillian Adams, who was not half as ill as she thought she was?"

"But she was really suffering, and I helped to give her relief."

"No doubt of it. I was suffering that same evening, too, I remember, with a troublesome tooth; but no one came to my relief."

"All are not like you, dear. You do not demand the sympathy of every one."

"Fortunately all are not like me, but you are mistaken about my demands on sympathy. I like it just as well as the next one, but trust I have been too well brought up to make exorbitant drains on my friends. And what is the result of our labors? I just ran across Ida and Belle in the hall, talking about you as the girl who had failed."

"You have not delved down into the baser side of my nature," she said, smiling. "One of my weaknesses is an overmastering desire to excel in whatever I undertake. When I first came here there was a prayer foremost in my mind, and it was something like this: 'Save me from myself.' I used to breathe it very often, as I found before I had been here long, that there was more need of it than even I had anticipated. The first shock came when I found my reluctance to give up any chosen task for the sake of others. I fought many a battle, dear, and often my soul's life was dwarfed and threatened thereby. Yes, I failed in ranking with the leaders," she continued with a quiet smile, "and am very sorry to disappoint my friends; but I am not unhappy."

"Unhappy! Well, I should say not. You have done more toward uplifting the moral element of the class than any ten students in it. While the rest of us have been selfishly striving for the goal, each in her own way, you have been living the religion of Christ."

"Hush. I have only striven to sacrifice selfish desires."

"And God has blessed you for it," was the heartily spoken answer.

"How did Lena rank in her class?" asked an inquiring friend, of her mother.

"Lena has not told me, but I always have the happy assurance that she will do nothing short of her best wherever she is placed."

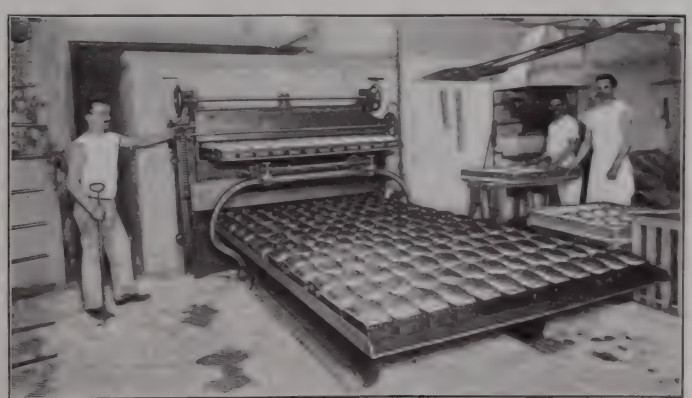
HERE IS THE DOUGH

The brave girl, happy in her consciousness of having loving approval, sighed under her breath and said: "I believe I was ranked as 'the girl who failed.'"

But, was it failure?

Oh, watching angels' faces paled,
And music swelled to her who failed.

SARAH V. DUBOIS.



PRESTO! THE LOAVES

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—ANGIE. Your callers should leave at ten o'clock.

—LOUISE. In a sick room do not try to sweep. Wipe the floor with a dampened cloth.

—IRENE. It is very natural that your daughter of sixteen should object to the constant company of her sister of five. Can you not manage to let her be relieved at times?

—MARTHA. Have as many photographs and pretty things in your room as you can keep neat and well dusted. Small articles that gather dust are not an addition to any room.

Boys and Housekeeping

FOUR years ago, in a suburban town in New Jersey, two lads of sixteen, having between them eighty seven cents in money, started a business enterprise. One of the boys had always enjoyed helping his mother in her housewifery, particularly when the season came round for making preserves and pickles. When a summer of unrelenting heat the mother aside, the farmer made up their minds that the next winter would be marked by a consumption of the canned and preserved fruit, of which it was found, but very rarely could without the pluck and energy of the eldest son. He used his vacation in doing all for the benefit what his mother had formerly done, and as the autumn her preserves closet showed fully six hundred shelves. It was this experience that enthused him and a companion to go very simply and inexpensively into the business of running restaurants, small parties into the business of running restaurants. To-day, after four years, one young partner having retired and gone into other business, the original beginner is the proprietor of a large and paying plant. He says housekeeping was easy as an extra as well as a girl, and the lessons that conquering so eagerly to the demands of baseball and football can be trained without trouble to the lifting of many a domestic load. Whatever you do, mothers, do not undone, do not forget to set apart the boys that they may look outside of the narrow circle of home. They will be better sons and brothers for this training, very possibly better men of business for it, and very certainly, better husbands by and bye, for girls who are fortunate enough to marry them.

A New Way to Manage an Old Task

Though the world has moved so swiftly forward in arts industrial and in applied sciences domestic economy has hardly been able to keep the pace. Women by scores and hundreds make bread exactly as their grandmothers did, and even bakers who turn out loaves in great quantities have not been able to secure all they ought out of the flour, in the way of saving and work manipulation and profit. The kneading and mixing machine of the National Bread Company, can turn a whole barrel of flour into bread in thirty minutes, which is certainly much like magic. Machine made bread is thoroughly kneaded, altogether clean, and absolutely well moulded. This machine is a champion mixer and kneader. Appealing to bakers in the first instance, some modification of this ingenious invention may soon be introduced for the individual housekeeper. I long to see the day when families may combine in a given neighborhood and do their cooking and baking in a co-operative kitchen, thus lessening the housework in room some portion of the daily drudgery and leaving her free for other engagements, and for more enjoyment of her children.

The pictures give you a good idea of the ease in which bread is made by this new machine.

WHEN BLUEBIRDS COME

When bluebirds bring
The earliest spring
And on the wing
Flash past the door,
Then shall we look
In Nature's book
And hear the brook
Dash on once more.

Patchwork Quilts

Great store of beautiful patchwork quilts lies in many a thrifty woman's attic. I speak of country homes, for in the city we have no attics. These quilts are valued, not only for their obvious use, as coverlets for the bed, but also, when two people use one, to cure them for portieres and draperies and for the cushions of couches. I saw one a few days ago that was [illegible] to adorn any mansion, so choice was its coloring so harmonious its arrangement, and so intricate the pattern of its quilting.

Small Courtesies

Never omit small courtesies: Good morning, and Good evening, I thank you, Pardon me, Please, and other gracious forms are signs of good breeding, and most helps to make the home-life gladder and to lighten the daily load.

A Boy Who Was Part of God's Great Plan

THE PLOT AGAINST PAUL

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR MAY 10
ACTS 23: 12-22. READ 22: 29 TO 23: 9

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT—ACTS 23: 11: "THE LORD STOOD BY HIM AND SAID, BE OF GOOD CHEER"

IT is hardly more than a week since the loving friends of Paul, men, women and children in Cesærea, had with tears and entreaties, bidden him farewell, as with anticipation of persecution he resumed his journey to Jerusalem. And Paul is now back in Cæsarea, bound with chains, as Agabus had predicted he would be, in the dramatic use of his girdle. The days intervening have been full of tragic events. "Tell us, Paul, did you make a mistake in leaving Cæsarea against the advice of your friends? And what brings you back so soon?"

ORIENTAL BOY

Paul answers: "I will reply to the first part of your question by saying that no mistake was made in leaving Cæsarea to continue my journey to Jerusalem, for I was instructed by the Spirit of God to go. As to why I come to Cæsarea so soon, I have much to say. The circumstances of my seizure in the Temple, and the rough usage given me by the infuriated mob, who were mercilessly beating the very life out of me when the Captain Claudius Lysias appeared on the scene with his soldiers, and released me from their grip by bringing me as a prisoner to the Castle Antonia, are all known to you. At my request, the captain granted me opportunity to address the people from the castle stairs, in the hope that I might appease them by a statement of facts concerning myself. But their fury was only aroused again, and I was brought into the castle.

"I soon discovered another beating awaited me there, for the captain gave orders that I should be scourged, in order that I might confess the crime which had so enraged the people against me. I brought about a stay of proceedings by declaring that I was a Roman citizen, and as such could not be scourged until condemned. This claim on my part brought Captain Lysias himself to me, who, in a half apologetic way, tried to conciliate me for the proffered indignity, and I was left alone with my guard for the night. In the words of King David, 'I laid me down and slept; I awaked, for the Lord sustained me.'

"Early in the morning, at the command of Lysias, I was taken before the Sanhedrin for examination as to the charges brought against me. In this way he tried to shift the responsibility he had incurred in ordering me to be scourged. But how could it be hoped that a man could have justice in the council of his enemies?"

Illustration and Application

I. The sure promise of God. What a beautiful sample of God's exceeding great and precious promises is the one that came to Paul, like "songs in the night," in the prison to which he had been twice brought to save his life from the Jewish mob! It is when we, too, are misunderstood, misrepresented, bruised, in peril, that God's promises come like angels to minister cheer and strength and assurance of deliverance. Judson, the great missionary, who, like Paul, was "a prisoner of the Lord," when asked in those days of few converts and many difficulties, whether he thought the prospects bright for the conversion of the world, replied, in words that are deservedly familiar, but still needed: "As bright as the promises of God." When men like Paul are on the scaffold, and men like Nero on the throne, and when even church people allow bigotry to take the place of brotherhood, we need to turn to such a promise as the second Psalm, as given in its full significance in the Revision:

Why do the nations rage,
And the peoples imagine a vain thing
The kings of the earth set themselves,
And the rulers take counsel together
Against Jehovah and against his Anointed.

. . . . . .

Yet have I set my King upon my holy hill of Zion.

. . . . . .

Blessed are all they that take refuge in Him.

And when the peril and anxiety are personal, God puts his promises, like stars, into our midnight, saying, as to Paul:

Faint not nor fear, his arms are near,
He faileth not, and thou art dear.

Plans are said to be in the course of completion, to establish a system of wireless telegraphy between one of the great packing houses in Chicago and its branches in Kansas City and other points. The company are said to pay more than $100,000 a year to telegraph companies for the use of wires, which are interrupted by storms. The telegraph has often been used to illustrate prayer, but prayer is a wireless telegraphy that is "not interrupted by storms." Again and again in Paul's stormiest seasons, his prayer for help was answered by Christ coming in person to "stand by him." Assurance that we are saved and safe may be ours from the beginning if we rest unquestioningly on God's sure promises. "How is it you are so sure you have not been rejected?" said a doubting Christian to a joyous convert. The reply was: "Because Jesus promised, 'Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out,' and I'm the 'him' that came." God makes a contract with us in the promise, "If we confess our sins he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." Shall we only "cherish a hope" that God will keep his word? Rather let us rest in his promise, like Paul, though forty devils plot to kill our faith.

. . . . . .

II. God's Providence uses even a boy. God had assured Paul he should go to Rome. The next day Paul's young nephew, by doing a simple duty—carrying news of the Jews' deadly plot to Uncle Paul and Captain Lysias—unconsciously helped God to carry out his plan by hurrying Paul off on the first stage of his journey. So every boy and girl may say, in words borrowed from the Song of a Star:

I'm a little part of God's great plan.
And I'll always do the best I can.

Since science has revealed the orderly laws of nature it has become harder for many to believe in Providence and prayer. To this doubt Victor Hugo once answered in a company of Frenchmen: "I believe in Providence because I am a providence myself. We caught a mouse yesterday. Its death sentence was already pronounced, when my little granddaughter, Jeanne, with eyes glistening with tears, begged for the life of the gray prisoner. Her mother hesitated whether to listen to the dear little advocate or not, and in her doubt said, 'Grandfather shall decide.' So they came to me. For a moment I held the power of life and death over the little creature; and I thought: The heavenly Providence may find itself in my situation when the fate of a being of higher order is to be determined. Naturally, I set the mouse free; for, when a man undertakes the roll of Providence on a small scale, he should, at least, imitate its generosity."

Every day human love and will interpose their higher laws among the laws of nature, and why should we doubt that the All-Father, too, shall hear the cry of the children he loves and interpose his mightier will, guided by perfect wisdom, to do what we ask, in the time and way we ask, or to do something better at a better time and in a better way. If we may not ask anything of God because he is wiser, no more may a child ask anything of its earthly father. A case where a mother might have helped God in the soul of her boy is the following: In a summer home at the seaside a mother told her boy not to go down to the beach, hard by, but stay on the lawn awhile till she should come and take him for a walk. His boy friends came again and again and called him to come down to the beach and wade, but he sadly shook his head. After waiting a long time for his mother and refusing again and again temptations to disobey her word, he walked down to the gate and began to toy with the latch, looking eagerly to the glistening ocean in whose wavelets his little neighbors were having great sport. But after standing a moment or two at the gate, he turned, and with firm set lips and hands clasped tight behind him, walked away from temptation. His mother did not come, and after awhile he went again to the gate, and this time opened it a little, but instead of going through he turned firmly and walked back to the veranda. Still his mother did not come. It was hot and lonely and stupid in his yard. At last he ran to the gate, and, without stopping, ran through and played on the beach till the supper bell called him in. His mother met him with uplifted finger and reproving look. "Ah, Rodney, Rodney, you have disobeyed me," and his flaming cheeks and downcast eyes were full confession. "I was watching you all the time," his mother went on. "I saw you go to the gate twice and come back." With trembling lips the boy answered, "Why didn't you tap on the window and help a fellow?" God was working manifestly in the child's conscience, and a wiser mother would have helped God and helped her boy at the time of half-victory by a tap on the window and the fulfilment of her promise to take him for a walk. We help the King of kings to save the world by every act of brotherly love which proclaims the power of Christ to conquer selfishness.

General Ts'en has recently been appointed viceroy of Si-Chuan in Western China. In the province of Shansi he had resolutely repressed the Boxers. The various missionaries in the province of Si-Chuan therefore wrote him a letter of welcome. In his reply, the heathen general declares that he could not have accomplished his object had it not been that all the leaders of the Christian Church had lived up to that precept of the save-the-world religion: "Love men as thyself."

RUINS OF CASTLE OF ANTONIA, PAUL'S PRISON

. . . . . .

III. God's plan does not dispense with our work. In all the Bible there is no better illustration than in this story of Paul's deliverance, of the harmony of God's foreordination and man's freedom, of faith and works. The eleventh verse gives God's promise that Paul is to testify in far-off Rome. In verse twelve we see forty Jews making a plan to kill Paul before breakfast. A little later, Paul's nephew brings the news of this plot to Paul. Does he say, "I shall do nothing about it, for God has other plans, and he will see they are not frustrated?" Nay, Paul does just what he would have done if his escape wholly depended on himself. He sends his nephew to Captain Lysias, a Roman worshiper of Jove, who helps God with four hundred and seventy soldiers, and starts Paul forthwith on the first stage of his journey to Rome, all unconscious, as was the boy also, that he was playing a part in a plan of God.

THE CENTURION LOOSED PAUL OF HIS BANDS AND SET HIM BEFORE THE COUNCIL

The connection between faith and works is happily illustrated in the case of the little Philadelphia girl. "Mamma," she said, when looking for a lost treasure, "I think God will help us find it if we ask him; so I'll pray while you hunt."

Paul's promise did not end with Rome. Beyond it he ever saw the only "Eternal City." On Rothschild's palatial residence at Hyde Park, London, are the words, cut in the cornice: "This is not my home: I am traveling to eternity." A few weeks ago, a celebrated preacher, Dr. Joseph Parker, was lying on his death-bed. Every effort was made to relieve the monotony of the long, weary days. One afternoon, a friendly minister, who had just returned from a holiday in Palestine, sat by the bedside of the sufferer and endeavored to interest him with an account of all he had seen and heard in the Holy Land. Dr. Parker seemed to give but little heed to what was said, but at last, his eyes riveted upon the "golden sunset deepening the west," he pointed to the glorious sky and murmured: "My Holy Land is there."

Gleanings

As God made the wrath of the Jews to work out his purpose to send Paul to Rome, so God has often overruled the hatred of truth to promote it. A French colporteur was in a crowded train on the Continent. Opening his pack, he quietly offered his Bibles and Testaments for sale. Some passengers purchased, others angrily refused to do so. One gentleman bought five Testaments, then opened the window, and with a gesture of scorn threw them out, saying: "That's the best place for such rubbish!" The colporteur prayed earnestly that God would not let those copies of his own Word be wasted. Time passed. It was suggested to this colporteur to carry his books to the signalmen and pointsmen along the line of a certain railway. As he was showing them to some navvies he found working there, one said: "Why, these are like the books our mates picked up a year or two ago!" "They are," said another; "a neighbor of mine got one, and he and his wife are never tired of reading it. They say the whole world is different since they had it and believed what it told them." The colporteur found ready purchasers among those rough men, all of whom were Roman Catholics; and probably none of them would have bought, but for knowing about those Testaments, and the blessing they had brought to at least two lives.

COMPETITION 37

What three proper names mentioned in Scripture do these pictures represent?

Write "Competition 37" plainly across the top of a postal card or sheet of paper, next, your name, age and address; then the answers. For each of the three answers employ but one word—the proper name which you think the pictures represent. Don't quote Scripture passages. Simply state the name. Below the answer, write in not more twenty words, what, in your judgment, are the most important facts concerning the subject of the first of these pictures. Read the rules given below.

RULES AND PRIZES

Contests are not open to competitors over fourteen years of age. Do not send two solutions. There is no objection to asking the help of others, but each competitor must send in the answers in his or her own handwriting. Should you use paper instead of a postal card, be sure to write on the envelope in which you enclose your answer "Competition 37." Write on one side of paper only.

Prizes—For the best answer to Competition 37, a handsome silver watch, lady's or gentleman's. For the second best answer, our Smith-Pelouhet Bible Dictionary; the third, Child-Life in Colonial Days, by Alice Morse Earle, a delightful illustrated book; for the fourth, Bob: The Story of Our Mockingbird, by Sidney Lanier, illustrated. For the next best answer from each State, territory and Canadian province sending meritorious responses to competitions, a beautiful book as consolation prize.

All answers must be mailed not later than May 4. Address, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Little Folks' Department, Bible House, N. Y.

Answer to Competition 31, in our issue of March 25, are: 1. Methuselah. 2. Isaac. 3. Noah. 4. Nero: Cæsar.

The longest-lived man, son of the saintliest man of his time, was Methuselah. Noah's grandfather. He lived 969 years.

Announcement of Prize-Winners in Competition of March 25

For the best answer to "Picture Puzzles" of March 25, Herbert P. Creed, Fredericton, N. B. Can., receives a silver watch; for the second best answer, Madge Lee Ivins, Schuylkill, Ill., receives our Smith Pelouet Bible Dictionary; for the third, Marguerite Rankin, Tuscumbia, Tenn., receives a copy of Jessica of the Dead, by Long; for the fourth, Marion C. Bidwell, Stockbridge, Mass., receives a copy of Our Own Birds, by Bailey. Each of the following receives a book:

Entertaining Christ*

The Publican who had the Honor of Having Christ as his Guest

THERE is little reason to doubt that the Jews had valid reason for their dislike of the publicans. That one of themselves should undertake to collect the public taxes for the hated Roman government, was in itself a reason for contempt. But the publicans, knowing that they were hated and despised, appear to have retaliated by extortion, and so intensified the public scorn. It is evident, however, that there were good men among them, though they could not redeem the general character of their profession. The declaration of Zaccheus, that he gave half his income to the poor, and that he made restitution whenever he discovered that he had wrongly assessed a taxpayer, shows that he was an honest and benevolent man. The original language proves that this was not a thing he intended to do, as a result of Christ's visit, but a thing that he did habitually. A man of this character deserved public esteem, but he was so lowered by the profession which he followed, that there was general surprise that the young Teacher should become his guest.

It was certainly a great honor that Jesus paid to the man. What a privilege it was to entertain Jesus! How we envy Zaccheus! Yet the privilege is open to us. Christ promises that those who overcome, shall be honored in just this way. He will come and sup with them. It is worth the struggle to obtain mastery over self, to resist temptation, and to reject the maxims and principles of the world, that Christ will come as a guest and be a companion. We may well be astonished, as was Zaccheus, by such condescension. He, doubtless, never expected such an honor. He went out desiring only to see Jesus, and he was so much in earnest in his desire, that he overcame the obstacle of his stature, by climbing the tree. We, too, find it difficult to see Jesus, to get a clear view of his character, to understand his spirit and motives. But how few are so intent on accomplishing this, that we take trouble, as Zaccheus did, in order to succeed. We know the blessing that comes to those who do succeed, for they not only behold him, but in beholding are changed into the same image.

WITHOUT GOD IN THE WORLD

By Emma Bates Harvey

III.

NO longer had any sympathy for anyone. I was hypocritical, timid, cowardly and treacherous. I felt and knew, in my better moments, that everything noble in my nature was fast disappearing, and I remembered that God had said man was in his own image. How could a man without God have anything of the image left?

I have dwelt on my own sufferings, but what must have been Edith's! Never swerving in her love for me, doomed to be shut in from all sunlight of life with a man whom all considered a maniac.

At first I was not unkind to her, until one day I remembered the Bible said, "Husbands, love your wives." That was her death sentence to all happiness. From that moment, I believe I hated her at times, and yet how wildly, passionately, did I love her, at others.

She was, indeed, my guardian angel. I believed then, and always shall believe, it was owing to her care and love, to her religion, that I did not lose my mind.

Five years went by, and oh, the horrors of living. Do not think that I became the loathsome wreck I was all in a moment; oh, no! My punishment was much more cruel than that! It was a gradual loss of my higher nature, a slow, living death of my better self, to which I was doomed, a daily spectator.

The age has gone by when brimstone and fire represent to us the highest degree of torture. My physical sufferings were intense, but were nothing compared to the mental agony, as in my stronger moments I compared my present self with the manhood in which I once had taken such pride! I had once such high ideals, and had so despised anything mean or untrue, and here I was daily abhorring myself more and more, as a thing most vile. What could be the end? I had once read of a story among the ancients of one of Cleopatra's slow poisons. The victim to whom she gave it lived on and on to suffer, and it was said that each day one new pang of agony was added to the suffering, and with each new pang was added a day of life! The poison was so deadly in its work, that, one by one, the fingers, the toes, and then the hands and feet of the victim would wither away. The eyes, nose, and ears would become affected, until no semblance of the human form was left! I felt mutilated, deformed and agonized lump of flesh was left cringing and crawling on the ground, and suing in vain for death!

What that poison was to the body became a curse to my soul! I repeated over and over again to myself: "A mutilated, deformed and agonized lump of flesh, cringing and crawling on the ground, and suing in vain for death!"

I could not sleep for misery. I would lock myself into my beautiful library, now destitute of all books; for one day, in a sudden frenzy, I had burned one after another of costly volumes, lest, in some evil moment, I might open their lids and find within them some reference to God.

I paced up and down my magnificent halls. No longer could I trust myself with my profession. I could not endure even the oath of the court-room.

Back and forth did I walk until dinner-time. Usually, Edith and I ate this meal in silence, for long ago she had given up, as in vain, the task of entertaining me.

One day, I well remember, I pushed my plate away in disgust, I had no appetite. Edith looked distressed, but pretended not to notice me. "There is smallpox in the village," she said at last, "and they can get no nurses." She hesitated, "Old Hannah, your boyhood's friend, Philip, is very ill, and Dan has just died of the disease. Do you mind if I go to their help? Really, Philip, I feel that I ought."

I looked at her savagely. "Yes," I roared, "what do I care for their distress? Leave them alone!"

I left the room and slammed the door after me. A feeling of shame came over me, as I realized that, not ten years before, in boyish enthusiasm, I had sat up all night with my sick pony; but this was another world and I another being, and I groaned as I remembered the light-hearted boy.

Then, I knew afterwards, Edith went to her room and spent many minutes on her knees, praying that help to me might speedily come. I have learned since, that on that very morning our old doctor had called on her, and urged the necessity of putting me at once into an asylum, telling her that it was no longer safe for her to live with me! So Edith spent that afternoon praying, praying as for a lost soul. Who knows the potency of prayer!

I never had suffered more mentally than on that afternoon. Towards night I rushed into Edith's room. It had been so long since I had sought her company, that the poor child trembled with fear when she saw me, as if a new calamity had befallen us.

"Edith," I said, "isn't there an old law somewhere, saying that if a man commits murder, by confession and giving up his own life he gains forgiveness?"

"Yes," Edith said, "I remember."

"Well, Edith, I am in hell, and shall be lost forever, if something is not done quickly. I am going into the thickest of the smallpox, and while I yet have self-control enough, I will give my life to nursing those poor men, and so may gain release from this awful curse."

Happier than I had been for five years, out of doors I rushed, down into the village. I saw the red flags, the devastation everywhere, I found Hannah's house, and I hurried in the door and found her moaning for water. What was it sent me back? Fear of the infection? Oh, no. We battle not with "things visible, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of darkness."

Even as I was going for water to quench the thirst of a dying woman came the words to my heart, "Inasmuch as ye do it unto the least of these, ye do it unto me."

By my own choice, I was without God in the world and did not believe in Jesus Christ—how could I do anything for Him?

I groaned in agony, and hurried back to my room, there to feel Edith's arms around me in loving compassion.

"Oh, Edith!" I sobbed, "that is the law of our land, but there is a greater law. What, oh what, can save a man's soul?"

Darker days followed. My errand to old Hannah had been given the widest interpretation. Nothing but the awful ravages of the smallpox prevented the authorities from at once placing me under lock and key as a madman. I thought I could not live and suffer more, but I found I little knew the possibilities of suffering for a God-forsaken soul.

Edith, my protecting angel, was ill. I myself had brought her the smallpox. I should have committed suicide then if I had dared, but I dared not. I was too big a coward, and if you will believe it, so little manhood did I possess, that there was one thing I feared more than Edith's death, and that was my own. My soul was tormented night and day. Life was hell to me, but I feared death more. I had indeed experimented, and knew to what depths a man could sink without a God.

I remembered of once reading from a favorite author of the "Evolution of the soul," in which he claimed that the soul had evolved through the ages, acquiring, itself, in turn, the nature of each lower form of life, and of itself rejecting the lesser functions, and holding fast to the higher, until the finished product was called the soul of man.

It was strange how these atheistic beliefs that once had so delighted me now merely added to my agony.

I remembered with greatest scorn this author now, and thought with almost fiendish glee, that I would like to write a "Treatise on the soul" myself, and call my work "The devolution of the soul." I was pleased with my coining of this expression, as I thought what a work of genius it would be to trace the backward growth of a human soul, down, down through the very ugliest, lowest forms of animal life—down, down to the devils themselves.

Owing to God's goodness, Edith got well—and I, for some strange reason, found my own sufferings less acute. Edith needed a change, and in one of my stronger moments, I agreed to take a little cottage in the woods of Cape Cod, hoping that, under new conditions, help might come to both of us. I could not be more miserable anywhere.

On one summer's day we drove together. I do not know what mystical influences were at work. I only know my heart was strangely at rest. Twice lately, I had heard Edith indirectly refer to religion, and for some strange reason had not even objected.

"Philip" said Edith suddenly, and a strange pallor spread over her countenance, "I have been very near to another world, and I believe new help and knowledge have been given to me. Over five years have gone by since you sinned grievously. You have been awfully punished. At the time, father and I both felt uncertain how far was his own responsibility, in regard to this curse." I cringed, but Edith continued. "It was for this reason, he was so willing for me to marry you, and why I, too, hesitated to no longer. He believed his daughter in some way might be used to help redeem your soul. Five years have gone by, and daily I have seen you grow lower and lower before me. Don't interrupt me. I beg you. You cannot know how wells but Philip. I believe there is help for us. It may be a wild mistake. You may suffer more than ever, but for my sake, for the sake of all my suffering, will you go to camp meeting with me? It is only a few minutes' ride from here. We are nearer than you think. I believe I am being led in this way by a mighty power outside of myself.

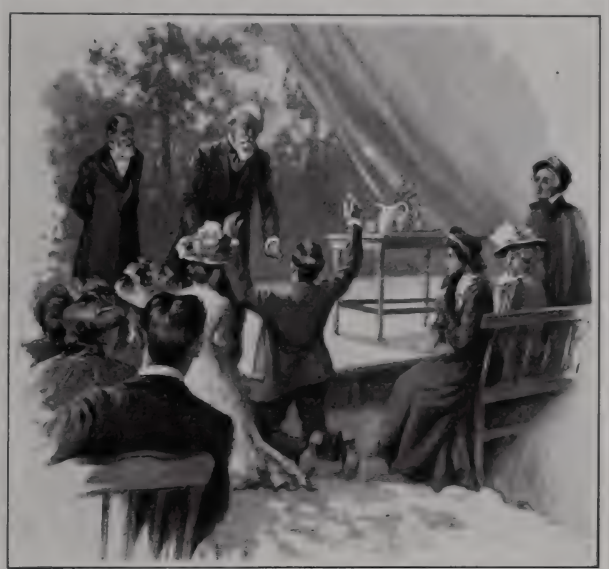
"Because of the suffering, we have avoided what we considered the exciting cause. I believe we are all wrong, and the only way to bring you peace in this world or the next is to resolve to face your sin like a man; resolve you will believe in the One whom you have rejected, and seek for his forgiveness until you find it, or death."

My old pain came on, and as Edith watched me suffering, I supposed that would be my answer, and she would be only too glad to take me home.

But what was my surprise to find her determined in her first purpose, and for some strange reason, I silently acquiesced to her will.



"I FELL ON MY KNEES AT THE ALTAR"

Through what a tumult I was going! One moment I resolved I would jump from the carriage and rush for home. The next, I felt held to my place by some strange influence.

We rode on, and soon heard the distinct singing from the camp meeting. Attuned to the murmuring branches of the pines, the æolian harps of the woodland, is there any singing like the distant echo of those camp-meeting melodies? I was amazed, for at their sweet cadence, though suffering, the suffering was within my control.

The singing no longer stirred the tree-tops, and in its place there was the voice of one that was preaching, and his tall figure stood out in wonderful distinctness against the background of evergreen.

It was, indeed, Edith's father! At the sight of me he started, and then, as he lifted his face to God, I knew he was praying for a lost soul.

We drew up in the outer circle, within easy hearing distance of the minister.

The preacher told the simple, old story of the prodigal. At the time I did not marvel that I could hear "God" mentioned, and keep my soul in peace, I only knew that I was breathlessly interested, for it was a story of a man who had forgotten God, and I pitied him. Inspired as one of old, the preacher talked on. Such was his pathos and power that the vast audience was in tears, and I, with Edith's hand in mine, sat spellbound.

"My friend," said the speaker, "you cannot live without God. You need him in every path of life."

He then portrayed with vivid power the condition of a lost soul. I groaned in agony. I knew his words were true.

Bursting into tears, the old saint concluded, as if but one auditor was in that whole assembly: "My boy, come home; oh, come home to a Father's love! There is only one thing in the universe that can save a lost soul, that your cure was effected by simply going forward to a camp-meeting altar, and saying, 'Lord, I believe. Help thou my unbelief'"

I can only reply, "If you consider what was represented by that act, yes."

I cannot explain what to my heart was a wondrous miracle, and yet I know that there was power enough in the simple story of Jesus Christ to bring one poor soul from hell to heaven.

And is this any more wonderful than the daily miracles of God's power in nature every day?

Oh, thou profane philosopher, thou sayest thou believest nothing that does not come within the bounds of reason. Art thou sure?

I have a little seed. In time, the little seed, helped by the sun and rain, and my care, becomes a flower.

Thou sayest thou believest the seed became the flower, because of thy reason, which shows the relation between cause and effect.

I say that for five years I was without God in the world, and I say belief in Jesus Christ as the Son of God, changed my very life. My belief is based on my knowledge of reason, as shown in the relation of cause and effect.

Thou, who so easily can believe in the power of a little flower seed, canst thou not believe in the greater power of the Son of God?

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Subscriber, Cleavesville, Mo. When a man objects to alms-giving, would his Christian wife be justified in giving alms without his knowledge, provided, however, she gives from her own money?

Surely, if she is dealing with her own money there need be no secrecy about it. We can hardly understand how a man should find fault with a wife for well-doing. In law and morals, she would be justified in giving alms, of course. Her duty to God and her own conscience should take precedence always.

M. J. G. Has the term "horticulture" come to be limited to the growing of flowers only? I so often hear it applied as if this were so.

To quote Bailey's Cyclopedia of American Horticulture, the term embraces four co-ordinate branches—pomology (growing of fruits); olericulture (growing of vegetables); floriculture (growing of flowers), and landscape gardening. Floriculture is the most important in the world at large, says the same authority, as measured by the number of people interested, and the number of species of plants grown; no less than 25,000 different species of plants are in cultivation. In North America, the great fruit-growing country of the world, pomology is the most important, by reason of its commercial supremacy.

C. J. H., New Tripoli, Pa. When and by whom was the æolian harp invented? Was the string made of gut or steel wire?

Very little is known about the æolian harp. It was devised in Greece, and named after Eolus, the god of the winds. It consisted of a wooden sounding-box, over which catgut strings were stretched, and these, when exposed to a current of air, produced a variety of pleasing, harmonious sounds, in strange succession and combination. The strings were probably keyed up or tuned to chord.

From Mrs. Woods Baker, Arlayd, Djursholm, Sweden, comes this touching little poem, telling of a child's sympathy for the starving little ones of Finland:

A Swedish daily paper
A touching group displayed,
Of haggard, hungry children,
Then asked for "Finland's aid."
Soon in the homes of plenty,
Full many hearts awoke,
And at their loaded tables,
Of "Finland," fathers spoke.

Wild-eyed, the children listened,
And not without a tear;
And wondered things so dreadful
Could be to them so near.
"I have not seen that paper,"
"A country uncle" said,
"That picture of the children,
Who died for want of bread."

He opened wide the journal—
"What are these scraps?" he said,
As bits of broken "candies"
Were round the starving spread.
"O! that is Elsie's doing,"
(The mother's tears would come)
"Whenever she has goodies,
She gives those children some.

"It seems to soothe her feelings,
To fancy she has fed,
Those little ones in Finland,
Who have not even bread."

Mrs. R., Dresden, Germany. Who founded Robert College in Constantinople, and when was it founded? Is the founder living? Was it founded for Orientals only?

Robert College is a memorial to the benevolence of Christopher Robert, a New York merchant, now dead. Established in 1863, in the Mission Theological Seminary at Bebek. Present buildings erected 1869. Rev. Cyrus Hamlin, the distinguished missionary, was instrumental in making the project a success. Its students represent nearly every nationality found in Constantinople—Bulgarians and Armenians probably predominating.

Rossiter, Camden, N. J. I was deeply interested in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S story of Chandra Das' exploration in Tibet. What other explorer has recently succeeded in penetrating to Lhasa?

Carey, an English traveler, penetrated Tibet in 1889, but did not reach Lhasa. Twenty-two white men in all have succeeded in reaching Lhasa, the first being a priest, named Odoric, in 1325. The last white man to succeed was M. Huc, a Frenchman, who, with M. Gabet, a fellow-countryman, spent two months in the Tibetan capital and was then expelled. Chandra Das' first journey to Lhasa occurred in 1882.

Anxious, Germantown, Pa. Does the warning to those who sin wilfully after conversion, really exclude the penitent from hope?

No, the penitent seeking pardon is sure to obtain it, though it may be after much sorrow and suffering. There are too many passages scattered through the Bible encouraging the backslider to return, and assuring him of welcome and forgiveness, to admit of any doubt on that matter. God will assuredly receive his wandering children if they return to him, as the Prodigal Son in the parable did, forsaking their sins, humbling themselves, and pleading for pardon for Christ's sake. The trouble generally is that they have no desire to return, being hardened; or that they despair, being tempted. The passage you quote does not refer to such cases. It applies to people who turn away from Christ to seek salvation by rites, ceremonies or penances. They are warned that no other means avails for the purging of sins than the sacrifice of Christ, and that those who reject that, must suffer the penalty.

J. J. O., Pittsburg, Pa. What was the cost of the great wars of the last century?

In his famous book, The Future of War, the well known authority, Jean de Bloch (who died lately) gave these approximate figures: War between France and Russia, 1812-1815, $345,000,000; Crimean War, $1,700,000,000; American Civil War, $5,000,000,000; Danish War, 1864, $36,000,000; Austro-Prussian War, 1866, $330,000,000; Franco-German War, 1870, $2,500,000,000; Russo-Turkish War, 1877, $1,200,000,000.

Rev. E. F. Burr, Lyme, Conn., writes:

In common with many, I hope, I have been much gratified with the more positive and aggressive note of your journal of late as to the current apostasy from the Bible. Shall the enemy take possession of the fortress without any outcry from the watchmen? "Cry aloud, spare not, lift up thy voice like a trumpet," etc.

T. K. S., New York. In the Church Bulletin (a Catholic monthly magazine) is published that beautiful consecration hymn,

"Take my life and let it be Consecrated, Lord, to thee" and the authorship is ascribed to "Kalamazoo Augustinian." In our church hymn-books this poem is attributed to Frances Ridley Havergal. The two versions are alike, with the exception that the Catholic edition does not contain the two lines,

"Take my silver and my gold,
Not a mite would I withhold."

Will you please say who was the author of the hymn?

In a letter written Feb. 4, 1874, Miss Havergal gives the origin of her "Consecration Hymn." She writes: "I went for a little visit to Ardsley House. There were ten persons in the house, some unconverted and long prayed for, and some converted but not rejoicing Christians. He gave me the prayer: 'Lord, give me all in this house,' and he did . . . The last night, I was too happy to sleep, and passed most of the night in praise and renewal of my own consecration, and these little couplets formed themselves and chimed in my heart one after another, till they gushed with 'Ever, only, All for Thee.'" There is not a word in the letter to show that the hymn was not original and spontaneous. It has been translated into many languages. We have never before heard the authorship questioned.

Y. L. M., Houghton, N.Y. 1. Has the sale of liquor increased as fast as the population in the last century? 2. Where is the centre of population?

1. Figures on the subject are not available earlier than 1877. These are given below:

YEAR	POP. AT LAST CENSUS	TOTAL CONSUMPTION OF WINES AND LIQUORS
1877	38,558,371	386,225,115 gals.
1880	50,155,783	500,076,400 "
1885	"	688,632,415 "
1890	62,622,250	972,578,878 "
1895	"	1,140,764,716 "
1900	76,303,387	1,349,176,033 "
1901	"	1,390,127,329 "

In 1880, the consumption was about 10 gallons per capita; it is now 19.48, an increase of over 93 per cent. 2. The centre of population is six miles southeast of Columbus, Ind.

F. C., Buena Vista, Ky. Please give me some information regarding the appearance and customs of the inhabitants of Treasury Island, one of the Solomon group.

The Solomon islanders, excepting the inhabitants of Bellona and Rennell and Ongtong Java, who are pure Polynesians, are described as "a small, sturdy Melanesian race," with brown or copperish skins, short noses, rather thick lips, receding chins: they are intelligent, crafty, thievish, revengeful; are fond of dancing; make pan-pipes and jew's-harps; speak many dialects; go often unclad; little is known of their religion. See some good encyclopædia.

M. H. W., Fall River, Mass. Can you inform me of any school or schools for sub-normal children? My friend has a son, not idiotic nor a fool, yet not mentally up to the standard of the average boy. He has an excellent memory, and is very observing, but seems childish for his age, and cannot compete with other children in his studies, etc. He needs to be in a school where he can have special training, and where his weak faculties, mental and physical, can be developed.

"Something for nothing" is a proposal which usually invites suspicion, and justly, too. We have something we want to send for nothing to every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, but we propose to be perfectly frank with you, and tell you just how and where we expect to receive an adequate return for our expenditure. We have the happy fortune to be the publishers of the late Speaker Reed's unique library of modern eloquence, and we know that if you were to read any one of the 500 brilliant After-Dinner Speeches, Lectures and Addresses found in this Library of the World's best spoken thought, you would surely be enthusiastic in your appreciation, and would probably never be quite satisfied until you had placed the complete work in your library. This, then, is the plain reason why we are going to mail you, upon receipt of 6 cents in stamps to cover postage, your choice of the booklets described below. All we ask is that you read the first page and we know you will read what follows. In these Booklets, as in MODERN ELOQUENCE itself, each speech is given in full, just as it was delivered.

Booklet No. 318
MERCHANTS AND MINISTERS
By HENRY WARD BEECHER
THE BENCH AND THE BAR
By JOSEPH HODGES CHOATE
THE MEDICAL PROFESSION
By SAMUEL BALDWIN WARD
INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION
By WILLIAM MAXWELL EVARTS

Here are topics that are timely and vital to you no matter what your occupation may be.

It is not necessary now to allude to the eloquence and intellect of Beecher. Never before was his theory that the church and the store have a common interest in the foundation of morality so applicable to conditions.

Ambassador Choate was a lawyer before he was a diplomat, and whatever he has to say of his profession is replete with humor and truth.

Dr. Ward's opinions of physicians and their practice are also tinged with levity while embodying at the same time much food for thought.

As for William M. Evarts, no man stood higher as an expounder of law, and few excelled him in beauty of expression. There is instruction as well as entertainment in these speeches.

Booklet No. 320
ACRES OF DIAMONDS
By RUSSELL HERRMAN CONWELL

The mammoth temple wherein Dr. Conwell preaches is filled to overflowing by thousands at every service, and wherever he delivers his great lecture, "Acres of Diamonds," in the United States, or Canada, or England, thousands rush to hear him. He must possess some marvelous secret of success.

His world-famous lecture, couched in the homeliest language, tells the secret. And brilliantly he illustrates his theories with stories of personal and historic incident. He is well able to furnish these illustrations, for during his long life he has been on intimate terms with the great makers of national history, and with the mighty of the mighty in the mercantile and professional worlds.

This lecture has increased the fortunes of thousands of listeners, and no man who desires to succeed in life should let pass by this opportunity to read the whole lecture free of charge.

Booklet No. 319
NEW ENGLAND WEATHER
By MARK TWAIN
A Blend of CAVALIER and PURITAN
By HENRY C. CALDWELL
CAUSES OF UNPOPULARITY
By HEMAN LINCOLN WAYLAND

First of all, these speeches are humorous, full of gentle satire and withal founded on good, solid truth.

Mark Twain has long since outlived the need for eulogy and he never said funnier things than these about New England weather.

Judge Caldwell presents the proposition that our sturdy Americanism is an outgrowth of those conflicting elements, Puritanism and Cavalierism.

Dr. Wayland proves, in delightful fashion, that New Englanders have enemies only because they are so virtuous.

The tone of all three speeches is one of originality. They are toxic and refreshing. But they are not trifles, for all that. The most casual thoughts of such men always contain something new and worth knowing.

Be Discontented

You owe it as a duty to your family and yourself to banish from your living rooms the ashes, dirt and coal gases brought there by stoves or hot air furnace.

Be discontented with the old-fashioned, faulty heating methods. Why continue to buy this trouble at a very high price—paying a premium for it—when you consider that saves in fuel sufficient to pay in time the whole cost of the apparatus. Why therefore continue to pay extra for the bother, drudgery and fuel expense of stoves and hot air furnaces? Why lose in addition all the comfort, convenience and healthfulness of our way?

Hot Water Heating

Now put in any kind of a building at any time, without inconvenience to occupants. Requires far less care than does a parlor stove. Need not be connected to street water supply. Buy now at summer prices. Send for valuable information.

Arnold A. McK., Maxton, N. C. In the present conditions of society, the Sunday work of firemen, policemen, and, to some extent, of railroad men, is a necessity. It is, however, a great misfortune, since it debars them from the religious privileges of the day and denies them the needed rest for their bodies.

G. R. C., Hollidaysburg, Pa. Was Paul a member of the Sanhedrin? If so, could he have been a bachelor?

The only passage we know of which implies that he was a member of the Sanhedrin is Acts 26: 10, in which he spoke of giving his voice or vote for the condemnation of Christians. It is possible that the vote may have been cast in some other court, or as a witness or agent of the Sanhedrin without his being a member of that high court. There is now no means of knowing. If he was a member, he must have been married, for only married men were eligible. In that case, we must presume that his wife died, for when he wrote I Cor 7: 7, 8, he evidently had no wife. The more probable presumption is that he was never married, and therefore never a member of the Sanhedrin.

John Rule, Goshen, Ky. Can any reader tell me where I can find the old hymn entitled, "Christ in the Garden"? The first stanza ran something like this:

When nature was sinking in stillness to rest,
And the last beams of daylight shone dim in the West.

CALIFORNIA'S FLORAL FESTIVAL IN HONOR OF THE PRESIDENT'S VISIT

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S tour of the Pacific Coast will be marked by a variety of forms of welcome, but he will probably appreciate none more highly than the floral festivals that have been arranged in his honor in California. These unique festivals had their origin among the Spaniards and Mexicans. Some of the valleys of Central and Southern California produce such a wealth of bud and blossom, that a great number of varieties—from the modest daisy to the stately lily, and roses of gorgeous coloring—can be used in these festivals. Some of the archways under which the President will pass will contain tens of thousands of the choicest blossoms. In the floral parades, some of the vehicles will be wonderful creations of artistic beauty. The decorations are not confined to the carriages themselves, but frequently the harness and even the horses are included, while the gala costumes of the ladies, who occupy conspicuous places, greatly enhance the picture.

CHRIST'S ROYALTY*

Obedience to Him and Personal Loyalty to Him, the Test of Character

WHEN Christ said: "Follow Me:" and when he told his disciples that the test of their affection for him was, that they keep his commandments, he took a position that is not even now fully realized by men who call themselves by his name. We are so accustomed to speak of Jesus as being meek and lowly, that we are apt to forget how high were the claims he put forth, and how implicit is the obedience he requires.

Christ insisted that he was a King, and, at the very last, when clothed with the royal robe in mockery, he would abate not one jot of his claim, even when he knew that he was furnishing Pilate with an excuse for putting him to death. He firmly believed in his own royalty, and, in simple majesty, he performed its functions.

Christ was a king in the sense of establishing a kingdom. He proclaimed the Kingdom of God. People scoffed at him, but he was right, and his claims have been substantiated. They would have understood him had he set up his throne in Jerusalem and defied the Roman power. But how much higher was his ideal! He conceived of a kingdom which should embrace all nations and be above all governments. He has established such a kingdom. Throughout the world are to be found men loyal to their respective rulers, good citizens and law-abiding men, who in a day would be turned into rebels, if the claims of those rulers ever became antagonistic to the claims of Christ. He is to them King of kings, and their allegiance to him transcends all others.

He is also king in the sense of legislation. He does not argue or explain. His is no limited monarchy. His word is, "I say unto you." He expects unfaltering, unquestioning obedience. Personal attachment, personal loyalty are the principles of his kingdom. Men may hold different creeds, may worship him by different ceremonies, but there must be no division, no diversity in allegiance to him. He issues his commandments, and it is only as we obey that we can have any valid claim to call ourselves by his name. Only so can we enter the kingdom of heaven.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Excavations in Bible Lands *

THE attention of our readers has already been called to the exhaustive work edited by Prof. Hilprecht entitled, Explorations in Bible Lands during the Nineteenth Century, in an article published in these columns on Feb. 11. A resume was then given of the results obtained at Nippur, with which Prof. Hilprecht was personally associated. These, however, by no means comprise all that is of interest in this fascinating volume. There are chapters on Researches in Palestine, by Dr. J. Benzinger; on Excavations in Egypt, by Prof. Georg Steindorff, Ph.D.; and on Explorations in Arabia, by Prof. Fritz Hommel, Ph.D., all of which furnish new light on Biblical subjects.

Dr. Benzinger's articles, especially, being descriptive of the Holy Land, deserve careful study. They show, as is now generally acknowledged, that all descriptions and identifications prior to those of Dr. E. Robinson, of Brooklyn, N. Y., in 1838, were practically worthless. He was the pioneer in scientific exploration, and his work was continued by the Palestine Exploration Fund, under Captain Conder and Lord Kitchener, by whom careful surveys of the Holy Land were made, and the way prepared for the German expedition under Dr. Schumacher and Dr. Stubel, in 1884. We now know that the old city of Jerusalem has to be looked for about one hundred feet below the surface. It has been so often "conquered and destroyed and almost leveled to the ground and upon the ruins of the old, a new city always rose again." Excavations were almost impossible, as the owner of a modern house naturally objected to his property being pulled down or undermined to satisfy antiquarian research. Happily, however, there was on the ground, in Dr. Schick, an enthusiastic and vigilant explorer, who, for now nearly fifty years has watched every work done in the city requiring digging, and has been always eager to encourage every builder to lay a good foundation by going deep into the ground, while he followed every step with ardor, photographing and sketching and recording every object of interest In this way material has been accumulated, and year by year knowledge of the city has increased. It is gratifying to learn that the work is to be prosecuted with more vigor. Who can tell what that soil covers, and what corroboration of Scripture may yet be unearthed?

Egypt has proved a richer field of archæological search than any other of the Bible lands. Its close connection with the chosen people, not only in the time immediately preceding the Exodus, but in the later period when the Jews, coquetting with Egypt, brought on them the wrath of the Babylonians, renders it a most hopeful field of exploration. It was there that the Rosetta Stone was found, in 1799, on which was an inscription in three styles of writing, one of which being Greek, gave the key to the others, and so enabled scholars to decipher the hieroglyphs on the monuments. Among recent discoveries, the most important is that of the treasure city of Pithom, mentioned in Exodus 1: 11, and of the granaries, rectangular in form and without doors, which were probably made by order of Joseph, for the storing of corn during the seven years of plenty (Gen. 41: 48). Greatest discovery of all, however, was of the body of Rameses II., the Pharaoh who oppressed the Israelites, whose death is mentioned (Ex. 2: 23), and of the beloved Queen Nefertari, the mother of a long line of Pharaohs. The inscriptions on the mummy cloths in both instances furnished conclusive proofs of the identity of the bodies.

Exploration of Arabia began in 1764. It was not, however, until 1884, that the most successful of all explorers of Arabia—Eduard Glaser began his work. He found inscriptions which were of material help to explorers in other fields as well as to Biblical students. Incidental mention of names as in Isaiah 21, Ezek. 27, etc., find in these inscriptions elucidation. It is also evident that the ancient peoples who inhabited the region did not soon lose the religious impressions derived from Ishmael, the half brother of Isaac, and Esau, the twin brother of Isaac, whose posterity they were. Dr. Hommel believes that in the northeastern part of Arabia was the Ur of the Chaldees (Gen. 11: 31) from which Abraham came. Numerous words found in the inscriptions show also the origin of words used in the Pentateuch being either reminiscences of Moses of his long sojourn in that land, or of the earlier associations of the Patriarchs.

Prof. Hilprecht's book is so rich in its Biblical references and so full of elucidation and suggestion, that it is difficult to give a fair epitome of it in our space. We must refer the reader to the book itself, with its maps and numerous pictures, for further information.

A Book of Finnish Poems*

THE prominence Finland has recently acquired in the eyes of the world, owing to the terrible famine now raging over her territory, lends a peculiar timeliness to a little volume of poems, the first and probably the only work by a native Finlander in the English tongue. The English Lyrics of a Finnish Harp is a book to be estimated as a valuable addition to English poetic literature. In Mr. Donner, Finlander though he be, it is not difficult to recognize a writer who may be ranked with the younger generation of English masters of verse of to-day. In all that he writes, there is the individual note that betokens the sincere artist, the one who has really felt and pondered, and who has a message personal and vital, and of real import to mankind.

As is to be expected, perhaps, from a native of the far North, and particularly of muchtried Finland, a tinge of melancholy runs through almost all of his poetry, possibly more so in the original lyrics and sonnets than in the dozen translations of Finnish songs included in the book; yet one cannot lay the volume down without a consciousness of having listened to a message of cheer, an appeal to all to practice fortitude and courage in the face of the various adversities of life, and to progress toward higher ideals. This strong spiritual note, in the midst of the pessimism rampant in so much of our current literature, is in itself matter for congratulation. Listen, for instance, to this clarion tone from "Grit":

O Youth! rejoice that God has given
A will to scorn rebuff and threat;
And when thou hast undaunted striven
Toward goal for longer effort set,
Rejoice! thou hast enriched thy soul,
And summoned comrades to thy goal!

And this from the stirring "Song of the Undaunted":

For the coward and moping world has need of another strenuous voice,
Vibrant with elemental force, that will bid its clans rejoice
In the sweep of moor and sea and sky and the might of forest and flood,
And stir its melancholy heart with some independent blood.

Undeniably there is as much of the Anglo-Saxon as of the Finn in passages such as these. The same indomitable spirit, together with moods by turn sad and gay, is found in the "Songs of Finland," which seem to be admirably translated, preserving the spirit of the original. Among these are, notably, Sveaborg (Runeberg's celebrated poem descriptive of an incident in the Russo-Finnish War of 1808–9), and Suomi's Song. The last-named we quote, as typical not only of the quality of those metrical renderings, but of the Finnish temperament itself:

Hark! to Nature's voice enchanting,
Waino's runic hails still haunting
It is Suomi's song!
Hark! the lofty pines are sighing,
Hark! the mighty streams are crying—
It is Suomi's song!

Everywhere are changing voices—
Nature mourns or she rejoices—
Each is Suomi's song!
Brother, mourns thy heart in sadness,
Do thy pulses leap in gladness,
Thou hear'st Suomi's song!

Original lyrics take up the greater part of the volume, and are rich in poetic spirit, and filled with a high and tender idealism. We only quote a few from many fine passages:

The wild-flower bells that swing their silent toll
As some stray spirit passes down the flood.

The awed and tremulous joy of maid forsaking
The shrine of girlhood for her own new hearth.

These passages, from "Lombard Memories," have fine, idealistic descriptive power:

Sweet Sol the conjuror has come to play,
* * * * *
And coaxes from the winter-starved sprig
A diffident wee scout of tender green.

Again the vesper blush of your unmatched skies
Upon your faithful Alps glows joyously,
And your unbedied fays, the zephyrs, rise
To whisper to each mortal secretly
That Nature, praying to her Architect,
Has made your glorious floors her shrine.

In the "Ode to Finland," these lines are peculiarly appropriate now:

Dear Finland! loved cradle of my birth!
Once more cold, iron-heeled Adversity
Is picking his grim steps upon thy earth,
Wearing the conscious scowl of tyranny.
Feels thy great heart, O mother-country mine,
One pang of sorrow, whatsoe'er the cause,
There sorings in travail in my exiled breast
The answer-pang to thine.
Yet thousands of thy distant children pause
Consoled: "He chastens whom He loveth best."

We commend the book to the reader, who will enjoy the work of this gifted Anglo-Finnish poet.

WAITING THE CALL

I HAIL once more my natal day,
Still in my tenement of clay,
With many favors blest;
And He who placed the structure here
Can prop it up another year,
If He should think it best.

Long has it stood through snows and rains,
And braved life's fearful hurricanes,
While many stronger fell,
The reason why we cannot tell;
But what to us seems mystery
The Builder knows full well.

But now 'tis weather-worn and old:
The summer's heat and winter's cold
Pierce through the walls and roof.
'Tis like a garment, so worn out
To mend there seems no whereabout,
So worn is warp and woof.

The tottering pillars are all weak;
The poor old rusty hinges creak:
The windows, too, are dim,
Those slight discomforts we'll let pass,
For, looking darkly through a glass
We catch a hopeful gleam.

And when you see it prostrate lie,
Let not a tear bedim the eye,
The tenant is not here:
But just beyond Time's little space
She finds some quiet resting place,
No more to date her year.

And though she walks with you no more,
The world will move just as before,
'Tis meet it should be so.
Let each her house in order set,
That we may leave without regret
When we are called to go.

Northport, N. Y. ADELINE NAOMI FOX.

The New Secretary

UPON the resignation of Mr. John Willis Baer, as General Secretary of the Christian Endeavor Society, the Trustees made a careful inquiry to obtain the services of an efficient successor. Their choice has fallen on Mr. Van Ogden Vogt, of Beloit, Wis., and it is gratifying to learn that it was unanimous. He is not yet twenty-five years old, but has earned an excellent record, not only in Christian Endeavor work but in his college, where he has served as Secretary of the President and financial agent. Before going to study at Beloit, Mr. Vogt was a member of the Woodlawn Presbyterian Church, in Chicago. He is of Swiss descent, but both his father and grandfather were American citizens.

Morocco's War Goes On

In a letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from Tangier, Morocco, Missionary Frederick Weiss, writes:

War is still going on in the interior. The Sultan has come off victor in every battle, and he now has the confidence of the larger cities. Many heads of rebels have been cut off, salted, according to custom, and sent to the different cities, where they are nailed over the city gates. A few days ago, about one hundred men of the Amur tribe, on their way to Beni Abbas, were attacked by Moors of the Dumeria tribe, while loading the camels. The caravan lost, during the attack, one hundred and fifty camels and some of the merchandise, and a number of men were killed on both sides. Roads are unsafe in many districts owing to robber bands. All the missionaries have returned to the inland cities and the work is again prospering in their hands.

I can furnish them to you, together with the most satisfying evidence that they are absolutely trustworthy.

I would be glad to have you make the most careful and scrutinizing search of my record, find out whether I will do just as I agree to or not, and then find out if the mortgage securities I offer for sale are the kind described as gilt edged or not.

If you find them gilt edged, as you are bound to, I will be glad to sell them to you, collect the interest and forward it and personally look after the investments.

You will find me safe, honorable, reliable and responsible. I will see to it that you do not regret making an investment in North Dakota.

Interest and principal collected without expense. Remittances in New York exchange.

QUAINT PSALMS for QUEER FOLK

By Rev. C. H. Yatman

PSALM CXIII
Sunbeam Psalm

2. Blessed be the name of the Lord from this time forth and for evermore. 3. From the rising of the sun unto the going down of the same the Lord's name is to be praised.

"FROM THE RISING OF THE SUN"

This Psalm has a queer way of clearing up cloudy skies in Christian life. It pulls people from dust and dunghill and puts them on seats beside princes. Desolate wifehood is changed into joyful motherhood.

This Psalm, unlike most of David's writings, is free from even the names of the wicked or mention of iniquity. Sin turned out—Sunshine turned in.

PSALM CXIV
Red Sea Psalm

1. When Israel went out of Egypt, the house of Jacob from a people of strange language;

"JORDAN WAS DRIVEN BACK"

3. The sea saw it, and fled: Jordan was driven back.

4. The mountains skipped like rams, and the little hills like lambs.

5. What ailed thee, O thou sea, that thou fleddest? thou Jordan, that thou wast driven back?

6. Ye mountains, that ye skipped like rams, and ye little hills, like lambs?

Hard pressed pilgrims to Mt. Zion, who meet great obstacles in their way, get good reading here. Seas roll back; mountains melt; rocks, like flint, pour out fresh water like fountains. When God leads people by a wilderness route it is only to prove that his name is Wonderful.

PSALM CXV
Idolater's Psalm

4. Their idols are silver and gold, the work of men's hands.

"THEIR IDOLS ARE SILVER AND GOLD"

5. They have mouths, but they speak not: eyes have they, but they see not:

6. They have ears, but they hear not: noses have they, but they smell not:

7. They have hands, but they handle not: feet have they, but they walk not:

8. They that make them are like unto them; so is every one that trusteth in them.

Here is a Psalm for the heathen; their golden gods are good for nothing. Idolaters and idolatry are like the idols—dumb and dead. Small and great who trust the Lord get mercy. Great and small who trust to idols get misery. Covetousness, which is idolatry, is the one great sin of this day; it is universal—gold instead of God.

PSALM CXVI
Restful Psalm

6. The Lord preserveth the simple: I was brought low, and he helped me.

"AND MY FEET FROM FALLING"

7. Return unto thy rest, O my soul; for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with thee.

8. For thou hast delivered my soul from death, mine eyes from tears, and my feet from falling.

9. I will walk before the Lord in the land of the living.

10. I believed, therefore have I spoken.

When the sorrows of death and pain of hell, and trouble like great waves of the sea roll over the soul, here is the Psalm that leads to rest. It is more than an anchor to a ship; it is harbor and home in the courts of God. What a tempest the writer must have been in, when he said in haste, "all men are liars." It is well he had the cup of salvation near to drink and drown such falsehood.

ARTISTIC MONUMENTS

DUE respect for our departed loved ones demands that we erect Artistic and Enduring Memorials. Marble has proved an unfortunate failure. Moss-grown, broken and tumbled down slabs appear everywhere. Some cemeteries now prohibit marble entirely. Granite, too, soon gets discolored, moss-grown, cracks, crumbles and decays. Besides, it is very expensive.

WHITE BRONZE Monuments are Cheaper and Infinitely BETTER

They are strictly everlasting. Rust, corrosion and moss-growth are IMPOSSIBILITIES. They CANNOT crumble from the action of frost. WHITE BRONZE is far more artistic and expressive than any stone. Then why not investigate it? It has been on the market for over twenty-five years and is an established success.

It has been adopted for more than a hundred public monuments and by thousands of delighted individuals in all parts of the country. Many granite dealers have used White Bronze in preference to granite for their own burial plots.

We have hundreds of beautiful designs at prices from $4 to $4,000. We deal direct and deliver everywhere. Distance is no obstacle. Write us once for designs and information if you are interested, stating about what expense you anticipate. It costs nothing and puts you under no obligation whatever. Over $80,000 worth of work sold to Christian Herald readers the last few years. AGENTS WANTED.

"Just Supposin'"

Just suppose that you knew for sure that we send you a high grade range—none better at any price—for from $12 to $20 less than your dealer asks you for a range not so good. Would you keep that $12 or $20 in your pocket or would you give it to the dealer? We do save our customers that much money and

We Send the Range on 360 Days Approval Test.

Every range blacked and polished; any man can put it up. We pay the freight. Wouldn't it be wise to investigate? Our book No. 103 is free for the asking. Write for it.

THE PRISONER OF CHRIST

Paul Saved by a Heathen From His Brethren

By Mrs. M. Baxter

WHEN the Lord disclosed to his servant Ananias, his purposes for Saul of Tarsus, he told him, "I will show him how great things he must suffer for my name's sake." This Paul accepted as his vocation. He did not count it a strange thing concerning the fiery trial which was to try him, as though some strange thing happened unto him, but rejoiced inasmuch as he was partaker of Christ's sufferings. He reckoned that he had suffered the loss of all things that he might "win Christ," with all that this involved of "the fellowship of his sufferings." Already, in Asia, he had suffered trials which befel him by the plots of the Jews (Acts 20: 19, R.V.). But how he was to experience the most determined and desperate plot against his life which had yet been formed.

After bearing his witness of the Lord Jesus, and of the personal dealing of the Lord with him, standing on the steps of the castle, he was detained there as a prisoner, but loosed from his bonds. And on the morrow the chief captain, who was desirous to get to the bottom of the cause why such bitter hostility had been manifested against him by the multitude, commanded the chief priests and all their council to appear, and brought Paul down, and set him before them (Acts 22: 30). Paul did not alone meet his accusers: his God was with him. Earnestly and steadfastly beholding the council, not like a man who had guilty conscience, he said, "Men and brethren, I have lived in all good conscience before God unto this day." (Paul had an exercised conscience: he had ever before him to be void of offence toward God and toward men"; Acts 24: 16).

At these words, the high priest commanded them that stood by him to smite him on the mouth. It was an illegal proceeding, and Paul said unto him, "God shall smite thee, thou whited wall; for sittest thou to judge me after the law, and commandest me to be smitten contrary to the law?" As a prisoner at the bar, Paul had a right to the protection of the law. He always taught obedience to the law (Rom. 13: 1–7), while he taught that, in a personal matter, it was better to suffer wrong, than for brother to go to law with brother (I. Cor. 6: 1–7). But now he was standing convicted, not of any breach of the law, but only of faithfulness to Christ, and he would have been untrue to the high priest and to the chief captain if he had not pointed out the inconsistency of the high priest's action. But when he was asked, "Revilest thou God's high priest?" he at once gave in, and said, "I wist not, brethren, that he was the high priest; for it is written, Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people" (Exod. 22: 28).

Jesus and the resurrection were always the theme of the first teachers of the Gospel. Paul, perceiving that his judges were composed of both Pharisees and Sadducees, cried out in the council, "Men and brethren, I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee; of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question." Had Paul been a man of the world, this would have been wise policy, but it may be that the Spirit of God led him in his also. At once a dissension arose between the rival parties. The Sadducees, the Rationalists of those days, said there was no resurrection, and they denied the existence of angels or spirits; and consequently they must have explained away much of the Scripture. The Pharisees believed in the resurrection, and in the existence of angels and spirits, although their worship consisted of externals and formalism.

There arose a great clamor (R. V.), and some of the Pharisees took Paul's part, and said, "We find no evil in this man; and what if a spirit hath spoken to him, or an angel?" And when there arose a great dissension, the chief captain, fearing lest Paul should be torn in pieces by them, commanded the soldiers to go down and to take him by force from among them, and to bring him into the castle." There he met with his unfailing Friend. "The night following, the Lord stood by him, and said, Be of good cheer, for as thou hast testified concerning me at Jerusalem, so must thou bear witness also at Rome." Oh, the strength of those moments in which the Lord thus draws nigh! In critical hours of our lives, what an intense peace has come when the Lord has stood by us, and we have been conscious of his holy presence, and understood him!

It was the eve of another danger. The morning light shone upon a conspiracy of Jews who banded together, and bound themselves under a curse, saying that they would neither eat nor drink till they had killed Paul. There were more than forty in this combination. And to the shame of the chief priests be it said, they knew they would find sympathy with them. It is very awful to think that these men who had refused the light when Paul told them of an opened heaven, and of God's message to him, should have come to this, that they could become parties to a dastardly attempt to murder the man whose testimony had condemned them! What an awful thing it is to resist the light!

and over three hundred equally attractive and serviceable articles, including Seth Thomas watches and clocks, Rogers Bros. celebrated 1847 silverware, Bromley's Smyrna rugs, Sanford's Axminster rugs, Irish point lace curtains, Racine sewing machines, Mitchell bicycles, and colonial parlor grand pianos, given with orders for Racine Hosiery, Racine Feet, and Racine Underwear, amounting to $3.00 and upwards. These handsome premiums represent manufacturer's agents', jobbers' and retailers' profits—you pay no more for our goods than you would pay at any store for similar quality—and you get positively the highest intrinsic value in Racine Knit Goods.

HOW CAN WE AFFORD TO DO IT?

We are actual, bona-fide manufacturers operating the most completely equipped hosiery and underwear mills in the United States, located at Beloit, Stevens Point, and Ripon, Wisconsin, with warehouse and selling offices at Racine, Wisconsin. (See issue of the Christian Herald for April 16, 1902.) We sell exclusively to the consumer. We are therefore content with the customary manufacturer's profit and can afford to give you the agent's, jobbers' and retailers' profits, in valuable premiums, which we buy in large quantities at wholesale prices, or about one-half what you would pay for them at retail.

Racine Hosiery—Racine Feet—Racine Underwear

We manufacture over ninety styles of high grade seamless hosiery, fifty styles of the finest underwear of the regular make, full fashioned type, and thirty styles of Swiss and derby ribbed underwear.

In selling to the wearer, we are directly responsible for our product and are manufacturing goods of the best quality only. We are using yarns of the best grade and dye them by our own sanitary process.

Our line of hosiery includes styles and sizes suitable for every member of a family, and ranges in price from 20c to 90c per pair, and comprises all the popular fabrics and colors.

Our underwear is equal in quality to the finest imported grades. The "Racine" garments are made in all the high grade fabrics—lisle, linen, worsted and silk, ranging in price from $1.00 per suit up.

Our "Racine Feet" are made of cotton and merino wool, in sizes suitable for men, women and children, and are of the same wearing quality that characterizes our entire line.

OUR ILLUSTRATED PREMIUM CATALOGUE

will be sent to you postpaid on receipt of your name and address. You need not write a letter, simply drop us a postal bearing the words "Send premium catalogue F." and add your name, street and number, town and state. The catalogue explains our method in detail and will show you how you can furnish your home completely with the valuable premiums we give that DO NOT COST YOU ONE CENT.

Church Societies, Benevolent Organizations, etc., are requested to write us for special plans by which they can secure any desired article, such as Church Organs, Pew Cushions, Carpets, Libraries, etc., free of all cost in exchange for a few hours' work on the part of their members.

You are respectfully referred to any banker, manufacturer or merchant in Racine as to our reliability and integrity. Our business was established in 1889. The present capital stock of our company is $500,000.00 and our stockholders reside in almost every state and territory in the Union. Write for Premium Catalogue F

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Uncle Oliver and Aunt Eliza, Winatchee, Wash. 1. Where are the verses entitled, "John Barleycorn" to be found? 2. Did Jephthah fulfil his rash vow? 3. What is the "Liberty Tree"?

1. In the poems of Robert Burns. 2. It is not recorded whether he did so or not. Some commentators conclude that the daughter may have been "offered up" by adopting a life of voluntary retirement. 3. During the war of Independence, Americans planted trees "as symbols of growing freedom." The idea was adopted by the Jacobins in France in 1790, and by the Italians in 1848.

E. L., Richmond, Va. What country was first to grant political rights to women?

Russia was the first government to grant any political recognition and rights to large numbers of women, says Kate Trimble Woolsey. Russia was, quoting the same authority, "the first to grant wives the right to individually hold and control property. Russian wives are mistresses of their own fortunes, and all women householders can vote either direct or by proxy in municipal matters. These are privileges they have had for centuries." In 1735, Sweden gave women taxpayers votes; France, 1831, gave widows votes by proxy, but has since removed the privilege; Prussia, 1856, gave all women with property qualifications votes by proxy.

Mrs. M. A. H., East Brookfield, Mass. 1. Where shall I find information as to the early life and training of Aaron Burr? 2. Into whose hands did he pass, and what was the style of his teaching after the death of his parents, at or before his third year? 3. How shall we account for the child of two such parents growing up so destitute of moral feeling, and so utterly unlike all we know of his ancestry?

1. Parton's Life of Aaron Burr (Houghton, Mifflin & Company, New York), and Todd's The True Aaron Burr (A. S. Barnes & Co., New York). 2. "Before he was two years old," says Todd, "he had lost father, mother, grandparents, and, orphaned and desolate, went to live with his uncle, Timothy Edwards, a strict martinet, steeped in the cold, rigid theology of the day. To his coldness and unwise government may be attributed much that was faulty in the character and subsequent career of his nephew," described as "impulsive, warm-hearted and high-spirited." 3. It seems indeed a mystery that the son of a clergyman, and the grandson of Jonathan Edwards, should have developed into such a character as that of Aaron Burr. Personal ambition, according to most authorities, led him astray. Mr. Todd claims that proofs, soon to be published by Mr. McCaleb, their finder, have been discovered in old Spanish archives in New Orleans and Mexico, showing that Burr was not altogether the traitor he has been adjudged by some historians.

Mother, Plainfield, N. J. What is the best way to teach children manners? I can tell my child not to eat with her knife, not to do this or that, but how can I impart to her a code that will so govern her conduct, as to make her at ease in any society?

Your question is a broad one, and too important to be lightly answered. The Golden Rule is the foundation of all good manners; in the absence of special training in life's small courtesies, it is a guide that should put none to the blush in any circle. Indeed, a person who knew no better than to eat with a knife might, in following this rule, be saved from offending in more serious ways where one of purely surface politeness would fail. All like to be familiar with the little customs and courtesies that distinguish life among cultured and well-bred people, and to give reasonable study in this direction is no mean occupation. "What we want," says Mrs. Hugh Bell, in The Minor Moralist, "is some scheme by which a complete training in demeanor should form part of regular curriculum." She thinks there ought to be a night school, where even grown people could take lessons in applying the wisdom of the ages and the cardinal virtues—justice, prudence, temperance, fortitude, faith, hope, charity—to their conduct in small matters of every-day life. The curriculum, she speaks of, would train children to play pleasantly, instead of quarrelsomely together; and to be in their daily behavior at home among kindred as they are desired to be abroad. They should be encouraged by parents to make a fine art of courtesy in little things.

Constant Reader, Jersey City, N. J. Do you think that the statement in Philippians 2: 10, that at the name of Jesus every knee shall bow, etc., implies that there may be repentance after death?

It rather seems to imply a confession of Christ's supremacy and triumph. We can imagine a man dying impenitent, realizing afterwards how foolish as well as how wicked he has been. You remember that in the Parable of Dives and Lazarus (Luke 16: 27, 28), the rich man was so convinced of his folly that he begged for his brothers to be warned, lest they, too, should be lost. James, too (2: 19), says that the devils believe and tremble. It is not so much a question of whether there is repentance after death, as whether repentance avails then. It is not for us to limit the mercy of God, but there is nothing in the Bible to encourage the hope of there being an opportunity of gaining salvation after death. Any man postponing repentance till then, runs an appalling risk against which he is emphatically warned.

From a reader of this journal in San Juan, Puerto Rico, we have received the following letter:

Dear Sir:—I wish you would give me all the information possible in regard to the "Christmas Tree," its origin, its meaning or significance, its use among the Protestant bodies of Christianity, and if it is or has ever been used by Roman Catholics anywhere. The reason I desire this information, is that last December many of the public schools in this island had Christmas festivals, with trees trimmed as you do in the States (the work was done mostly by American teachers). I had also the festival of my Sunday School (M. E. Church), and had a nice tree given to me from one of the public schools here in San Juan. A tree in the festival is an entirely new thing in this country; the Roman Catholics never had anything of the kind. I was surprised to see in the daily papers here, these Christian festivals invariably called La fiesta del arbol de Navidad, which means, "The Christmas Tree Festival." When I had the festival in my church, I explained to the audience that we were not celebrating the tree; that it was not a tree festival, but that the tree was simply an adornment. There is danger that the tree will become a species of idolatry. This people is used to festivals in which the image of some saint is present and finely adorned; and seeing now a tree, either in a school or in a church, where there is no saint or image of any kind, and a festival being observed, they do not dream that the festival is in honor of the birth of our Lord, but to give homage to the tree.

MANUEL ANDUJAR.

We do not share the apprehension of our correspondent that there is any real danger of the Christmas tree festival, in the Protestant churches or missions of our new colonies, ever degenerating into idolatry. The missionaries and teachers will see the necessity of explaining that the tree and its burden of gifts is an illuminated and decorated fir-tree in the church, which all the people round about came to see.

RUINS OF THE FAMOUS TEMPLE AT SARNATH, WHERE BUDDHA TAUGHT

Three miles from Benares, India, on the Grand Trunk or Pilgrim Road, is the site of the famous Buddhistic remains of Sarnath, a spot sacred to the followers of Buddha. According to the traditions, Prince Gautama took his abode at the Isipattana Vihar, a monastery in a deer park north of Sarnath, and near the present ruins, whose priests spent their time in meditation on the Vedas, and communed with nature, believing as they did, that departed spirits inhabited the surrounding forests. Buddha was supposed to have taken the form of a stag, and to haunt the spot where he had taught in former life. The Mohammedan invaders razed Sarnath to the ground and stripped it of its treasures. While looking at the splendid ruin, the traveler is apt to be surrounded by a host of beggars, the lame, halt, and blind, from the little village of Ghazipur, near by. The native boys and girls are relic hunters, and occasionally find valuable coins among the heaps of debris. Behind the tower is a rude pantheon dedicated to a collection of dilapidated stone deities, the best being one of Buddha, seated upon a lotus pedestal. They are, however, in too good a state of preservation to have belonged to the sixth century. Close by, and overshadowing the ruined tower of Sarnath, stands a new and gaudy temple, erected in honor of Shiva, the popular god of the Hindus of to-day.

ELIZABETH TAYLOR.

L. E. M., Danville, Quebec, Can. Who is the "Dudley" who is mentioned on page 60 of The Land We Live In, one of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Library books? Was he Governor Thomas Dudley?

The author, Mr. Mann, states that the person in question was Governor Joseph Dudley, a son of Governor Thomas Dudley. He was born at Roxbury, Mass., July 23, 1647, and died there April 2, 1720. King James II. appointed him President of New England, and King William afterward appointed him Chief Justice of New York. He visited England, was a member of Parliament and Deputy Governor of the Isle of Wight. In 1702 he was appointed Governor of Massachusetts, and held that office until 1715, when he retired to Roxbury. Inquire of the Librarian, Boston Public Library, concerning his descendants.

Schoolboy, Walla Walla, Wash. What were man's first weapons of war?

The natural supposition is that they were rocks, which could be thrown, and sticks, which could be used for beating. Then, working in flint, primitive man shaped his rocks into spearheads (fastening them on to his sticks, which had become polished poles), and into imperforate axes. He progressed until he made knife-daggers, shaped like a leaf, and choosing stones, now, for beauty of color as well as for qualities of use. The elongated knife-dagger, was his first sword. Next, perhaps, came the bow and arrow, a very beautiful invention, and representing what has been characterized as man's first step in applied mechanics. His first need for weapons seems to have been for protection against wild beasts, rather than against human enemies.

John S. W., Forsythe, O. Is it a sin to fish on the Sabbath?

The commandment is very plain, "On it (the Sabbath) thou shalt not do any work." Taking the highest example, that of Jesus Christ, we find that only works of necessity or of mercy are justifiable on the Sabbath. The pursuit of pleasure or the following of our ordinary week-day vocations cannot be said to come in this category.

Jessie M., Camden, N. J. What were the facts connected with the public sale of a slave girl by the late H. W. Beecher?

It is said that he once brought a fugitive slave girl on the platform of Plymouth Church and raised her ransom then and there. Again, on October 23, 1848, Rev. Mr. Beecher took a leading part in a meeting held in Broadway Tabernacle, New York, to raise a ransom for two slave girls, named Edmiston. The ransom was raised amid the utmost enthusiasm.

Guatemala Indians Destroy Their Idols

LIFE AMONG THE QUICHES, PICTURESQUE DESCENDANTS OF THE ANCIENT TOLTECS

FROM AN OCCASIONAL CORRESPONDENT

IN July, 1900, my wife and I arrived in Guatemala. A few months later, we began work among the Quiche Nation, composed of about 350,000 members. We were the first missionaries to settle among them for the purpose of teaching them the way of life.

The Quiches are descendants of the Toltecs, and retain many of their ancient customs. In no way are they to be compared to the aborigines of the United States, as they are extremely intelligent and industrious. They live in cities, towns, villages and farms, and are expert in spinning, dyeing, and weaving, and plant grain of all kinds, vegetables and fruits. The market gardens of Guatemala City are situated near this town, in the dry season under a good system of irrigation.

Before the advent of the Spaniards, the Quiche Nation was supreme in the greater part of Central America, and under its great king, was feared in all parts. In the ancient capital of the Quiche state, Quiche, twelve miles from this town, was the national college, where 3,000 youths were yearly taught, but to-day not a trace of it is to be seen. What do remain are the ruins of the last Quiche king's palace, but nearly all the stones are being used in the foundations of other houses in the town. War is now forgotten, and since 1812 there has been no general revolution among them, although at times certain towns rebel against acts of oppression and injustice, and much blood is shed. However, the Quiche native is now very peaceable. Cotton and woolen goods, of real merit and beautiful designs, are made by the natives on home-made looms. Besides, almost every trade is represented among them, and first-class carpenters and masons are common.

To suppose the Quiches are Romanists is a mistake, for, while Rome claims them, they care very little for her. While it is not a rare thing to hear an Indian pray to the Virgin and the saints, their real faith is the ancient one, which they have never given up. Native priests or wizards, called ajkeetz, conduct the worship, and teach the people about the conquest and their former greatness. On stone altars in secluded mountain spots, fire, incense, flowers, etc., are offered as sacrifices, and the priests declare that their god appears to them oftentimes. Until recent years, a live child was yearly thrown into a volcano near here, as an offering to the god who is supposed to live in it; but that custom has been abolished.

A NATIVE TYPE

A few years ago, a steamer was placed on a large lake near here, against the wishes of the inhabitants of the twelve towns along its shore. One day, when a steel launch (which was being towed by it) went down with people and animals, the accident was ascribed to the angry god of the lake, and sacrifices were offered secretly for several days afterward.

Until recent years, the Indian priests baptized newborn infants at a stream of running water, sacrificing at the same time a live chicken or turkey, and planting a grain of corn. The fruit of the stalk was carefully gathered, when ripe, made into cakes, and a great feast celebrated. Now the Roman priests pay certain ones to gather up the children for baptism in the churches, and the ancient custom is little practised.

QUICHE NATIVES OF CHICHICASTENANGO

Drunkenness is more and more prevalent, the liquor, called aguardiente, being made from bran and sugarcane. There is one town where it is not sold, the inhabitants paying a yearly tax to keep out saloons, and punishing every one who arrives home drunk.

Each town has a distinctive costume for its people, some of which are to be seen in the photographs I send you. The great gatherings of the people are on market days; and as Sunday is market day here, thousands are to be seen in the plaza, buying and selling all sorts of things.

We have an independent medical mission among the Quiches, and hundreds from all parts of our great field come to us for medicines and care. For a long time we were compelled to carry on our work in two small rooms, but a year ago were enabled to purchase a piece of ground in the centre of town, and have built a preaching hall and dispensary. We are now working on a room for a hospital and a dwelling-house. Our work is purely one of faith. The great difficulty has been for us to keep a sufficiency of medical supplies, as we buy in the United States, and receive goods by post and express.

Not only do we preach, teach and heal the sick here, but do a great deal of itinerant work in the towns and cities of our large field. About two hundred pounds of Gospel literature have been placed in the hands of the people, as many read Spanish, and we are forming a lending library of useful and instructive books. A friend in England recently sent us a number of Spanish books, and we hope to add to them from time to time. Good literature is rare in these lands, and we are besieged for reading matter wherever we go.

God has graciously blessed our labors, as numbers have been brought from darkness into light, and several are earnest workers. In one Indian school, near here, the boys carry new Testaments in their pockets, and not only read them, but read them to others. Several Quiches have destroyed their idols upon hearing the truth, one man burning an image which cost him $100 silver, or $100 paper money.

The volcanic eruption of October last has left the country poorer than ever. As far as eighty miles around, ashes, stones and sand were thrown, coffee plantations ruined, and thousands of lives of people and animals lost. There has been great interest in the Gospel in all parts, but now, as a war is threatened, every available man (Spanish-speaking) is at the front, and Gospel work is somewhat hindered, as martial law rules. One of our faithful evangelists is acting as a nurse among the sick soldiers; also preaching and distributing Gospel literature. He was the first-fruits in Quicheland and the first believer baptized here.

While we are working among the largest tribe, several others have as yet to receive Christ's messenger, as about six hundred thousand compose the remaining tribes.

NOBLE LAWYERS

TEXT—I. TIMOTHY 1: 8:
"The law is good, if a man use it lawfully"

PAUL had all the mental qualifications of a great lawyer. When he stood before Felix, and as his own advocate tore into pieces the charge made by the prosecuting attorney, Tertullus; when he argued before King Agrippa, until the king admitted he was "almost persuaded"; when he pleaded upon Mars' Hill with the jury of Greek scholars until at last even that central seat of Athenian culture was shaken to its very foundation by his proclamation of the "unknown God," we find the highest development of forensic training and legal acumen. As one schooled in the law, Paul knew the mighty and majestic power of the law, both spiritual and temporal. Therefore he lays down the broad proposition that law is good for the community, and that it is needed not only for the vindication of the right, but for the punishment of wrongdoers, whether the laws that they break are human or divine.

But though the legal profession offers such wonderful opportunities to defend the weak and punish the bad, there are some cynics who profess to believe that an honest lawyer does not exist. Sir Hartley Williams, a celebrated Australian judge, once pessimistically commented upon the fact that there was a pious lawyer in his circuit who used to regularly pray that he might get clients. "Imagine," said the judge, "the insult to the Almighty contained in the request that God should stir up strife among the people, foment discord, and promote litigation, just to serve the selfish purpose of this pious solicitor?" But that cynical comment of the learned judge might have been entirely wrong. That lawyer might be innocent of any desire to foment strife, and only anxious to have the opportunity of serving his fellow-man, and be able to redress the wrongs of some injured person.

The noble profession of the law is often unjustly maligned. Like other professions, it has in its ranks unworthy men who disgrace it, and there is no profession in which trickery and rascality reaps so rich a harvest. But it has also in its ranks noble, honest, sterling men, whose knowledge and talents are devoted to the cause of right and justice. I want to say to all young men who are entering that profession, that if they set before themselves a lofty ideal, and hold fast to Christian principle, they may win success in it, serving God faithfully, and keeping their character unstained. Let me try to give you briefly my conception of the principles of a Christian lawyer.

Champions of Justice

He will never champion a cause that he knows to be dishonest. Why? Because he would be aiding one man to deprive another of his rights. Oh, the wrongs that are perpetrated by the rich and powerful! Oh, how many there are who suffer all their lives at the hands of unscrupulous foes! For many years in the French Bastile, was confined a State prisoner, known as the "Man with the Iron Mask." He died in 1703. This prisoner was supposed by many writers to have been a twin brother of Louis XIV. He was confined in his living tomb with an iron mask over his face, lest he should come forth and claim the French throne, and thus cause a revolution. The iron mask concealed the face, because the prisoner was supposed to be facially an exact duplicate of the reigning king. If this story be true, it brands Louis XIV. as one of the most stony-hearted monsters who ever sat upon a throne. No matter what his own rights may have been, to protect those rights he was not justified in practising a lifetime injustice upon a brother. How many men are trying to deprive their brother man of his rights! The lawyer who helps them in their nefarious attempt, is a partaker with them in their crime. I am not here contending that it is wrong for the lawyer to defend a criminal in court. Every man is entitled to a fair trial. Even the wretch, Czolgosz, had his rights before the law, and justice required that those rights be protected. A lawyer often does an heroic part in defending a criminal, or in pleading that mercy be shown him; but there is no heroism, there is only shame, in aiding a client to cheat or defraud another.

Yet there are a great many lawyers who affirm that they have nothing to do with the honesty or dishonesty of a client. All that they must do is to present the best side of a civil suit, and then the judge or the jury will decide whether a cause is just or unjust. If a drunkard, by his own carelessness, falls off a moving electric car, they will bring suit against the street car corporation for $10,000, and not have one qualm of conscience. If a distant relative, by a technical flaw can break a will, they will help him do it, and divert the money of a rich man into a channel where it was never intended by the testator to go. This was the way the estate of a famous lawyer-statesman was legally stolen. Every one who read his will, clearly understood what the dead statesman wished to have done with his property. He wanted to have built a great public institution. Yet, some distant relative, with whom he never had any close affiliation, by the aid of scheming lawyers, broke that will. It was only because one of the new heirs was intrinsically honest that part of the estate was placed at the disposal of the trustees who were appointed to carry out the scheme.

There is an old saying, that "nothing is more deceptive than a column of figures." There is another old saying: "Nothing is more unjust at times than law." Any lawyer who prostitutes his brain and energy to plead the dishonest civil suit of a client, becomes a party to the corrupt purpose. The lawyer himself, by that advocacy, becomes a dishonest man. Abraham Lincoln won the appellation "Honest Abe." How? He would never allow himself to get mixed up in a dishonest suit. Many years ago, a man went to his office in Springfield, and wanted him to be his attorney for a certain case. After Mr. Lincoln had studied all the facts, he turned to this man, and said: "My friend, by a technicality ot the law you can win that case, but I will not argue it for you. You are dishonest in your attempts to win that money. If I stood before a jury to plead for you, every word I uttered would seem to echo in my mind this sentence: 'Abe, you are pleading for an untruth; Abe, you are a dishonest man!'" John J. Crittenton, the great Senator, had marvelous power with a jury. Every Kentuckian knew that Senator Crittenton would not under any condition consciously argue for a dishonest cause. Many a college lad has contracted a habit which has contaminated his whole future, by standing up in a literary society to champion a wrong theme. Therefore, my legal friend, never under any condition become a party to a fraud, by advocating in civil suit the dishonest cause of a corrupt client.

Scorns False Evidence

The honest lawyer never uses false means to plead for a justifiable cause. He never produces false witnesses to prove an alibi, no matter how much he may believe in the innocence of the defendant. He never believes it honest to be dishonest, or to tell a falsehood, no matter how good the cause may be for which that falsehood has been told.

But though this may be all true, the temptations before honest criminal lawyers are very great. Believing in the innocence of their clients, they know as no other class of men, how many innocent victims have been sent to the penitentiary or the gallows, through an unbreakable chain of false circumstantial evidence. In one of our large cities of the East, a man was aroused one night by a noise. With lighted candle and cocked revolver, he descended the stairs, and was shot dead. An ex-convict was arrested and charged with the crime. His lawyer believed him to be innocent. He did all in his power to save him. He was hanged. Some years after the execution, a dying convict confessed to that crime, and thus proved that an innocent man had his life choked out by false circumstantial evidence. In the same way, a few years ago, a woman in the far West was murdered. An innocent man, proved so by later developments, was found to have suffered for that crime. I once said to the Warden of Sing Sing Penitentiary: "Warden, do you believe there are any innocent men in this prison, who have been sent here unjustly by circumstantial evidence?" "Lots of them," he answered, "I believe there are lots of them." "Now," says the honest lawyer, "I believe my client is innocent. And yet this false chain of circumstantial evidence will convict him unless I break it. Is it not right to fight fraud by fraud? Am I not justified in using any means to deliver this innocent man?" In such a crisis the temptation is overwhelming to present any evidence available, even though it is known to be false. He argues himself into this position, because he believes he is justified in doing a wrong to win a right.

Disinterested Advice

But, my legal friend, two wrongs never make a right. No lawyer in any capacity is called upon to lie. A falsehood is a falsehood, no matter how it is told. If you believe in justice, your own hands must be clean when they touch hers, nor must you contaminate your own lips when you would woo her to protect the life of your client. If a lawyer is willing to lie for a good cause, the time will not be very far distant when he will be willing to tell a falsehood to win a bad cause.

The righteous lawyer tries to keep his client out of litigation, if possible. That means, he does for his client exactly what the honest doctor would do for his patient. The family physician, coming to the bedside of an invalid, does not say, "How long can I keep this man sick, so I can make as much money out of him as possible." He says, "How soon can I make this man well? The sooner the better. Better for me; better for the patient." Neither does the honest lawyer try to force his client into litigation. He knows that often the best way to settle a legal difficulty is outside the court, instead of inside.

An Eminent Legal Example

Practical illustration: A man comes to his lawyer and says, "I have been unjustly treated, and I want $5,000 damages. I want you to bring suit right away." What does that honest lawyer do? He looks all over the details of the case. Then, if he is conscientious, he says to his client, "My friend, you have sufficient grounds for damages; but as your lawyer, I am going to advise you as I would my own son. Do not get mixed up in this case, unless you must. The lawyers' fees may in the end cost more than you would make. Then, there is no telling what a jury may do. You might lose everything. I would compromise. I would take what I could get and let the rest go. It will be cheaper in the end. That is my advice." This is the same kind of advice which John K. Porter, for many years the leader of the New York bar, once gave to my father. My father determined, on one occasion, to appeal to the courts for vindication. He had conclusive evidence to support his case. He took this evidence to Mr. Porter's office and read it to him. After reading it, John K. Porter, as a conscientious lawyer, turned and said: "Dr. Talmage, upon that evidence I can win the suit for you. But I am going to tell you what I told Horace Greeley, who last week came on the same kind of an errand, and sat in the same chair on which you are now sitting: Go home and mind your business. You have a work to do. Life is too short for you to spend any of that time fighting in a court of law, unless your work is menaced." My father went home. The suit was never brought.

"But," says some young lawyer, "that may be all right for a well established attorney like John K. Porter to do. He had all the business he could carry. He could afford in his position to turn down a Greeley. But that is not the way a young man can build up a practice. It is what he does in the court, and not outside of it, that wins him fame." No, my friend, you are wrong. The public is not as stupid as you think. If that public once hears a whispering that you are trying to keep clients out of trouble, instead of pushing them in, you will have all the clients you want. Study Mayor Jones' history of Toledo, Ohio, who has just been re-elected for his fourth consecutive term. He is generally called "Golden Rule" Jones. I know nothing about Mr. Jones' private life, nothing about his politics. But this I do know, the people, the common people of that city, believe that Mr. Jones is their friend, and trying to help them as far as he is able to do. Every newspaper in that city was against him. During the campaign, they would not even print his name. The Republican and the Democratic organizations were against him. Each party had its separate candidate. Yet "Golden Rule" Jones went quietly ahead. At the public ballot boxes he received an overwhelming majority, his vote being seventy per cent. of all the votes cast. Why? The people, the common people, believed he was trying the lighten their burdens, instead of getting them into deeper trouble. What is true in reference to politics, is true in the lawyer's office. One of the best recommendations a lawyer can have is, that he always conscientiously and faithfully makes his clients' interests his own.

The Poor Man's Advocate

The high-principled lawyer protects the weak as well as the strong. The young graduate from a legal school is likely to take any case which comes in his way. It is not so much then a question of money, as of getting something to do. He will spend as much time over the case of a pet dog which has been poisoned in a backyard, as he will, twenty years later, on a hundred-thousand-dollar suit. But after awhile, that young man works his way up the legal ladder. His brain becomes keener, his experience greater. He stands in the front rank of his profession. What is the result? He ceases, as a rule, to deal with cases involving small fees. He is a railroad attorney, or a rich man's advocate.

My legal friend, now is your opportunity for heroic self-sacrifice. Do you know of a case in which a poor man is menaced with injustice? Do you know of a man who is charged with a crime of which he is innocent? The glory you win in championing his cause is better to you than a million-dollar fee. The great corporations and the wealthy men have reserved for their services the strongest legal brains of the country. I ask, who are going to look after the legal interests of the poor and the helpless? You know, just as well as I, that the critical time in the young man's life is just after he has committed that sin which he did thoughtlessly and without realizing its heinousness. You know that, if he is once convicted and sent to the penitentiary and herded in with a lot of old criminals, he will become one of the

THE LIBERAL ARTS BUILDING, ST. LOUIS, WHERE THE LOUISIANA PURCHASE ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION TAKES PLACE

The Louisiana Purchase Centenary at St. Louis

AN event of national importance during the present week, is the dedication in St. Louis of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the acquisition of the Louisiana territory. On April 30, 1803, Napoleon, by a treaty signed in Paris, ceded to the United States the magnificent territory which afterwards became the State of Louisiana, for the sum of 60,000,000 francs. The celebration of the Centennial Anniversary of this event in our nation's history will take place in the beautiful Liberal Arts Building, on the World's Fair grounds when the Louisiana Purchase Exposition will be formally dedicated. These ceremonies are under the direction of a Joint Committee, consisting of Hon. Thomas H. Carter, Chairman, and Messrs. Wm. Lindsay, John M. Thurston, John M. Allen, Corwin H. Spencer, W. H. Lee, James G. Butler, Lewis D. Dozier, J. C. Van Blarcom, Cyrus P. Walbridge, and James L. Blair. Two hundred acres in Forest Park, St. Louis, have been laid out as a site for the World's Fair, and about $20,000,000 is now being expended in the building of various exhibits. Every State in the Union and most of our island possessions have been allotted sites, to say nothing of the government exhibit, private concessions and buildings to be erected by fraternal and church societies. A majority of the foreign countries have signified their intention of having fine exhibits of their industrial, social, and artistic life. France will lead, having played a large part in the Louisiana Purchase.

Many church societies have adopted resolutions commending the World's Fair management upon the high moral plane after which they will conduct the Exposition, but none is of more significance than that adopted by the National Reform Association, at a recent annual session, which commends the action of the managers of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, who have from the beginning maintained an unequivocal position against the Sabbath opening of the gates at the World's Fair. The whole moral plane of this Louisiana Purchase Exposition will be so far above the average Fair of this kind, that even veteran travelers will be lost in the maze of really good things to be seen. The officials are sincere in their announcement to give a Twentieth Century Exposition, with all improper features missing.

There will be no sensational Midway, no dancing, no improper exhibits in any of the foreign villages. This clause will enter into all concessions to be granted. On the Concession street, which is to be a mile in length, and will include all foreign exhibits of small proportion, there will be no performance that will violate propriety. The chief features of Concession street will be a series of villages, representing the life and industries of native races of the several continents. These are to be arranged so that visitors may make a tour around the world, in miniature. Beginning with the quaint old cities of Europe, crossing Turkey to Damascus and Jerusalem, thence to India and the East Indian Islands, and returning by way of South America, Hawaii and the Philippines, the trip will be well worth taking.

The question of closing the Exposition on Sunday having been settled—officers and the Board of Directors having signed an agreement to that effect—the question of the sale of liquor on or near the grounds has likewise been settled, and no intoxicating drinks are to be purchased. The Hall of Philanthropy, to be constructed for the Board of Lady Managers, will contain much that will tend to influence the mind in a channel of good and righteousness. Mrs. James L. Blair, President of the Board, is endeavoring to secure only refined and instructing features for the Women's Building, so that the whole Fair will be a place of instruction in the truest sense. Plans have been made in St. Louis, by Rev. C. R. Carlos, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Church, for an Epworth hotel, with accommodation for 500 guests. Other denominations will arrange for similar hotels.

blackest of the black. Will you leave him to the care of one of those legal incompetents who are found hanging about every courtroom, waiting like vultures to pounce upon the helpless and the slain? Or will you, in the front rank of the legal profession, give your time and services to save that young man?

Shall the strong lawyers only look after the strong clients, and not after the weak? No, no. That is not what they ought to do. Surely the lawyers should be just as self-sacrificing in caring for the helpless unfortunates, as their brother professionals, the surgeons and the doctors. The poorest in our cities can have, if necessary, the services of the very best surgeon, or oculist, or aurist, or lung specialist. All a man has to do is to go to the hospital clinics, and the best medical and surgical skill is at his command free. Can it be that the lawyer is not ready to sacrifice as much for humanity's cause as the physician or the surgeon? Besides that, my able legal friend, you know your success has brought you plenty of money. You know the reason you do not retire from practice is simply because you cannot bear to be idle. Then, why not give a part of your time to helping the weak and down-trodden? Why not be a good Samaritan in the profession in which you see only too often the bruised and bleeding travelers who have fallen among the thieves on the Jericho road, and who have not one strong legal friend to come to their rescue?

The noble lawyer's greatest influence should be traced in the spiritual realm. It is necessary for him to plead the cause which will affect the individual temporal destiny. Is it not much more important for him to plead that cause which will affect another's life, not only for time, but for eternity? Every great lawyer is a leader in the community in which he lives. If he wishes, he may become a leader in municipal politics and statecraft—a leader in all the reformatory movements. Shall he not be a leader before the throne of grace?

Some people are foolish enough to suppose that a lawyer demeans his office when he champions the Gospel, just as a minister nearly always degrades his spiritual office when he becomes embroiled in the bitternesses of local politics. When Sir Thomas More used to visit his old home on the Sabbath day, he could always be found in the Episcopalian chancel, taking part in the service as a lay reader. A state officer one day came to him and said, "Sir Thomas, do you not think you are casting a slur upon your official position under the king? Ought the English Chancellor to perform the humble duties of a lay reader?" "Yes," answered the great statesman, "a Chancellor always serves his earthly king better when he is truly serving the King of kings." The lawyer who honors Christ above all, is the lawyer who will be the most faithful to his clients.

The noble Christian lawyer is most anxious to serve aright his associates in a spiritual and in a temporal sense. Why? He knows that, some day, all the acts of his life shall be passed upon by the greatest of all Supreme Courts, the great Judgment Seat of Christ. A lawyer is always more careful of a case if he thinks that case is going to be appealed to a higher court. One misstatement in a brief, or the lack of the sworn testimony of a witness, may mean the reversal of the lower court's decision. How much more, then, should the fact be ever present to him that he will one day have to stand at the bar of God. The true Christian lawyer is the man who is prayerfully careful of every word and deed and act of his life. All these acts are to be recorded in the "Book of Life," and read at the great "Assize of Heaven." Will you, my legal friend, live and work with this one thought before your mind? Live with the idea that some day the Christ, who once stood as a defendant before Pilate, is the Christ who, as a Judge, will have Pilate and other famous wrongdoers as defendants before him.

Young men about to enter the legal profession, I congratulate you. My congratulations, because you are going to enter the profession of Judge John McLean, the Christian; of Elder McDougal, the late leader of the Cincinnati bar, the Christian; of Benjamin Harrison, who used to pass bread and wine at the holy communion; of Judge Neilson, the Christian, and Daniel Webster, the Christian; of Joseph Story, the Christian, and of hosts of other leading advocates, and judges, whose faith in God was just as strong as their belief that law means justice, tempered with mercy, and justice to the strong and the weak alike. May you live as they lived. Do such work as they were able to accomplish. Die in their faith. Have the sins of your past life cleansed by the blood of Jesus, as theirs were wiped out. "The law is good, if a man use it lawfully."

POSTPONED REPENTANCE ❋ Paul Before Felix

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR MAY 17
ACTS 24: 10-16; 24-26.

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT—PSA. 23: 4: "I WILL FEAR NO EVIL; FOR THOU ART WITH ME"

PAUL was called to be the Apostle to the Gentiles. God, in his providence, arranged that his imprisonment should provide him with an influential Gentile audience. In no other way than as a prisoner on trial could he have preached to Felix, the Governor.

Illustration and Application

Felix means happy. Names in those days were used with close reference to their meaning. How sad and suggestive the contrast between his parents' dream of what he was to be, and what he was! Let us think a picture of the scene at his birth. The glad word had gone through the Roman household, and the sympathetic neighborhood, "A man child is born." What shall he be called? His parents expressed their own joy, and their prayer for the child's happiness by calling him "Felix." In his innocent childhood he was happy, and made others happy. But in manhood he allowed himself to be swerved by temptation from righteousness, that is, rightness, and from temperance. He lost that essential of happiness, "a conscience void of offence toward God and man." He could no longer look his mother or his wife in the face. There were persons who knew things that he was afraid they would tell. He got into public office and accepted bribes which did not bring joy. He had lost the very heart of happiness, God's approval and self-respect. And finally, when Paul brought him face to face with God, and he might have become a real Felix, passing from repentance to rejoicing, he postponed decision, and so lost his last opportunity to fulfil his mother's dream. He left Paul bound in body, and, sadder still, left himself bound to sin and sorrow. Let us every one ask whether there is not such a contrast in our lives between what we were to be and what we are. Many a mother has named her boy for John Wesley, or John Knox, or George Washington, or some other noble man. Surely the name itself was a perpetual prayer that the child might also have the nature of his great namesake, and might be at least as good, if not so great; might have his graces, if not his gifts. Are those thus nobly named fulfilling their cradle picture and prayer? Let it always be remembered that a prayer that a child may be good, is the right prayer to secure his true happiness as well.

A Lesson from Felix

PAUL PREACHING BEFORE FELIX AND HIS JEWISH WIFE, DRUSILLA

Let us now turn to Paul. His father named him after the tall King Saul, with a prayer for greatness more than goodness, it is to be feared. That original Saul had been too fond of power and of property, and so had dwarfed his soul, which might have towered above his people, as did his body.

Saul, afterwards called Paul, was one who proved better than his cradle prayer. He became great indeed, greater than his namesake, because his goodness towered aloft, the admiration of the ages, though his "bodily presence was weak." While Felix, unrepentant, could not be happy on a throne, Paul's letters are full of joy, even when written from his prisons. In all of his many "perils," our golden text was his comfort: "I will fear no evil; for thou art with me."

David, from whom Paul got such words of comfort, though he tasted almost every human sorrow that life can know—persecution, bereavement, defeat, slander, betrayal—worst of all, blood guiltiness—found in repentance and trust springs of joy that overflow like rivers in his psalms.

Paul's courage, in preaching to a royal sinner, recalls many a prophet: Moses calling Pharaoh to repentance and justice; Samuel rebuking Saul for disobedience; Nathan, rebuking David, at the risk of his own life; Elijah, reasoning of righteousness, temperance and a judgment to come before Ahab and Jezebel; Isaiah, rebuking the mighty in Judah, while Amos did the same in Israel; John the Baptist, daring to rebuke Herod's royal iniquity and die for it; Christ pouring upon the rulers of his time, the sevenfold lightning of his seven-times uttered: "Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites"—all these are given us as examples, not of reckless accusations but of fearless preaching and teaching, that no less faithfully points out the sins of the mighty than those of men of low degree. Yet, let us remember with what tact and tears Paul spoke, lest courage without tenderness should fail.

There is a third party in this lesson that we should study for our own warning—the Jewish accusers. They were better men, morally, than Felix, and had a far better creed—all the great truths of the Old Testament. But their religion was not deep enough to save them from envy and false accusations, and a hatred of men who differed in doctrine that was murder in the eye of God, and would have grown to that in deed, but for the interposition of a heathen captain. Let us not accuse others, but let us, who observe religious forms and belong to religious bodies, search our own hearts whether our religion is not contradicted by our deeds, our words, our very spirit of bitterness.

A Lesson from the Pharisees

It is said that three-fourths of the Bible is aimed at the unconverted members of the churches. The calls to "repent," if searched out in the concordance, will be found to be mostly addressed to those who professed religion in the Jewish and Christian churches. In the wilderness, what trouble God had with the church he had organized at Sinai, of a people newly delivered from Egyptian bondage, whose gratitude should have kept them loyal for one generation at least. Let us read the story anew of their murmurings, their doubts, their fearfulness, saying ever: "Lord, is it I?" How the prophets plead with the church whose sins brought disaster on the nation! And how large a part of Christ's preaching was to upright Pharisees, whose morals were clean, but their hearts bitter as gall! And even his own apostles, how slow of heart and selfish they themselves tell us they were! Not content with killing Christ, the Pharisees killed the Apostle James and sought to kill Peter and Paul—all the while so strict about religious forms, that they postponed killing Peter till "after Easter" (Acts 12), and dragged Paul out of the Temple lest his blood should pollute the holy place. In Revelation, the seven churches, most of which John lovingly censures, were Christian churches, some of which had already crowded out Christ and the love he brings (Rev. 2). It is to these backsliders that John cries "Repent."

* * *

And so we come back from study of the outside sinners, of whom Felix is a type, and of inside sinners, of whom Ananias is a type, to the call that Paul makes to both, for rightness and temperance, in view of the "judgment to come." There is a widespread feeling that because eternal punishment has been disputed, hell has been abolished. But we say again that we are not of those who pretend to be more gentle and merciful than Christ. Let his words be read even without comment, and the awful warning they naturally convey must be their true meaning. "Not literal fire," some say, but certainly the reality will not fall short of the figure. Christ is the one voice that all the world has heard, and we cannot but believe in his every word; and if we believe his words, and are repentant, we shall tremble as we read them.

"Judgment to Come"

Paul's Master said (Matt. 25: 46) "These shall go into everlasting punishment." Supposing that the word "everlasting" means, as some contend, "Age-long," though the best scholarship does not accept that rendering, yet surely, if it is only age-long future punishment of which the gentle Christ lovingly warns us, is not that enough, coming from such a Friend, to make us "tremble" for our sins and repent? The word of him whom even his critics call, "the purest among the mighty, and the mightiest among the pure," we cannot doubt. If he is not to be believed then no one in all the ages is to be trusted. And as sure as he is the Truth, there is a hell for unrepentant sinners.

And let us not postpone repentance, lest, as in the case of Felix, the very disposition to repent may be destroyed even while we live. He spoiled both worlds by his habit of delay. We do not so often as formerly press on congregations and classes the appeal for decision on the ground it may be "the last chance," but we should be wiser if we did. The only wise way is to live every day as if it were, as it may be, our last. We do not see so much remorse at the death beds of unrepentant men as formerly, because of the "eternal hope," that was not learned of Christ, and whose effect is often to make men who formerly postponed repentance to the death bed, postpone it to beyond death, and in that delusive hope waste the present life. The very fruits of the theory condemn it.

We may have told in these columns before, a story so pertinent to Felix that it will, in any case, bear repeating. A man raised in a Christian home, who postponed becoming a Christian when he was a boy, on the ground that he was "too young," when he took up business, postponed again because he was "too busy," said to his wife and his pastor, that he would give attention to religion when he had made a hundred thousand dollars. He did secure that in the course of years, but the habit of postponement continued, until suddenly a sick bed brought him face to face with God. His pastor urged him to repent and trust in God, and when he said it was too late, cited the penitent thief on the cross. "Nay, nay," said the merchant, "he had had no previous chance. He had not been urged to be a Christian for years by a Christian mother, a Christian teacher, a Christian wife, a Christian pastor. I have trifled with God until I cannot forgive myself nor ask God to forgive me." And so he died. "To-day, if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts."

A Story of Deadly Delay

RUINS OF THE CASTLE AT CÆSAREA IN WHICH PAUL WAS IMPRISONED

How mean such a life of selfishness seems as against unselfish efforts to save even the bodies of others! The very week this lesson was written, at a fire in Philadelphia, it was found that the family in escaping had left a little girl behind. A poor lad of about fourteen years, who knew the family, dashed into the flaming building to rescue her. The stairs he must climb were all aflame, and he turned back once, his hair on fire, but seized a sheet, wet it and threw it over his head, and then rushed through the fire and brought back the child, already so badly burned that she soon died. But it was a comfort that she died in the arms of her mother and was not consumed in the flames. The young hero belittled his brave act, saying, "Any one would do that to save a child." And shall we not be willing to make yet nobler efforts to save a child's soul from the blight of sin in this world and the world to come?

THE NEW YORK HELPING HAND'S ANNIVERSARY

Greatest of "Mothers' Meetings"

UPLIFTING EAST SIDE WOMANHOOD

A PICTURESQUE celebration was the twenty-third anniversary of the Stanton Street Helping Hand Association, in New York City recently. The assembly-room of the Pro-Cathedral was crowded with a company of tenement mothers, nearly everyone adorned with a big white apron and wearing a pleasant countenance. Many had no head-covering. Some wore little shawls on their shoulders. Everybody was spick-and-span, no matter how poor the garments. It was the gala-day of an organization which conducts what is perhaps the largest "Mothers' Meeting" in New York.

The platform looked like a conservatory, cut flowers and potted plants forming the fair line of division that separated the "Mothers" from their friends beloved — the Officers and Managers of the Helping Hand. What a difference between the hands on this side of the flowers and the hands on that! These are soft, white, pink-nailed, glittering with jewels; those are roughened with toil — washerwomen's and scrubwomen's hands. Yet in one respect all hands here are alike, and alike are beautiful—all are helping hands. None belong to the class the speaker of the day, Rev. Dr. J. Ross Stevenson, describes as "only good to look at and to receive gifts from others."

The "Mothers" have brought pots of flowers, one for each of their friends on the platform; they would not be prevented from spending some hard-earned pennies thus. And for each mother there is a potted plant, the gift of Mrs. Elias J. Herrick, founder of the Order. In the name of the "Mothers," Mr. Herrick, chairman of the meeting, presents photographs which they have had taken of themselves, one to Mrs. Frederick W. Vanderbilt, First Directress of the Board; one to Mrs. William F. Lee, Second Directress and their venerable spiritual leader, and one to Mrs. Herrick. There is no display of vanity in this. The "Mothers" know these ladies will set as great store by the picture of their white-aproned friends as by any fine painting on their walls. Rev. Mr. Kerridge, vicar of the Pro-Cathedral, voices the neighborhood's appreciation of the visits and services of women of wealth and culture, who have given not only of their means but of their time and toil to the task of making life sweeter and brighter for the poor. A musical entertainment as excellent as would be arranged for a rich woman's drawing-room has been provided. Mrs. John F. Brimes sings; Mrs. Corning and the Misses Keickerhoter play on piano, violin, 'cello and banjo. Then, the fine ladies go among the "Mothers," serving delicacies, cake and cream. Mrs. Lee plays "America"; "Mothers," officers, managers and guests sing it together, and everybody goes home happy.

SECTION OF ASSEMBLY-ROOM—MOTHERS' MEETING IN SESSION

"We hope you will come," says a soft-voiced lady manager to the representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, "to one of our regular meetings when they begin again next fall. I really enjoy more than an occasion like this our quiet hours here reading, sewing and tea-drinking with the mothers." Inquiry shows how thoroughly practical this Helping Hand work is. Its aim is to promote the moral, spiritual, social and economic welfare of the women in a very broad East Side territory. "It helps the mother, who usually is the most neglected one in the home, because of her self-denying love for her family," says Miss Faulhaber, the Association's faithful and efficient missionary visitor. The work is strictly unsectarian, although it has its home in an Episcopal institutional church. Mr. Frederick W. Vanderbilt contributed liberally to the construction of the Pro-Cathedral, to the end that the Helping Hand might have headquarters there. His wife meets all the running expenses of the organization, pays the Missionary Visitor's salary, and equips the Emergency Closet, which supplies delicacies to the sick. The "Relief Fund," upon which the missionary draws for cases of distress encountered in her visits is supplied by the Board. At regular sessions, the "Mothers" are divided into classes of ten, each in charge of a teacher who reads and talks to them and instructs them in sewing. These teachers are ladies from wealthy and fashionable sections of the city. To illustrate the spirit with which they enter into their work, the plea of Mrs. Louis J. Bellosa (daughter of the late Theodore Havemeyer), may be quoted: "Give me the most unattractive women that come for my class—those that nobody else wants—the lame, halt, deformed."

Care is taken not to pauperize beneficiaries. Women are paid by the hour for sewing done at the meetings; and with credits thus obtained, they purchase the garments they make and groceries which the Association secures for them at wholesale rates. Most of them are widows. Many are washerwomen. The "communal coal fund," to which each had contributed pennies as she could, banking through Miss Faulhaber, was a blessing to them last winter, for thus they got coal at wholesale rates instead of paying the ruinous price charged for it by the pail-full—when it could be had at all. The cutting and distribution of work is under the supervision of Mrs. E. M. Blum; Mrs. W. C. Stuart is in charge of the Emergency Closet; Mrs. Underhill, 267 Madison avenue, is Secretary; and anyone interested in the work can address their inquiries to this lady, or to Miss M. C. Faulhaber, 3,077 Webster avenue, New York.

Cherry Tree Homes of the Salvation Army

THE Salvation Army is making a heroic endeavor to save the children the world over. In England's large cities, effort is made to serve a hot breakfast to destitute children during the severe winter weather. In London, alone, 8,000 children are thus fed every morning of the week. In India, the Army has 10,000 children in its day schools, and 700 famine children in its orphanages. The Commonwealth of Australia engages the Salvation Army management for its reform schools, to which, at present, are committed 480 charges of the country—boys and girls, who, for one offence or another, have been brought before the police court.

Under the Stars and Stripes, we every year care for 500 children in our Rescue Homes. Nearly 9,799 pass through our slum nurseries. We have accommodation for 105 in our orphanages, better known as our Cherry Tree Homes, for waifs and strays. These Cherry Tree Homes (for there are three of them supported by the Salvation Army), had their day of small things years ago, when the slum sisters first began their work of love and mercy in New York City's darkest slums, Cherry street being the spot chosen for a day nursery, which was quickly established. It lacked almost every comfort except cleanliness and love. Cribs were an unknown luxury. A friendly store-keeper in the neighborhood helped us out by giving us boxes, which loving hands soon transformed into comfortable beds, and the babies were cared for, while the mothers left free to work. It more than once happened that the mother's death left the baby a ward of the Army. We had to have a home for waifs and strays, and our Cherry Tree Home at Rutherford, N. J., came into existence. The cost of this work to the government is much smaller than if they undertook it themselves, as beyond a small capitation grant per child, the entire expense is borne by the Army.

Two years ago, Commander and Consul Booth-Tucker decided that a still larger home was an absolute necessity, so a beautiful building was erected on the Salvation Army Colony at Amity, Colorado. Forty acres of land have been deeded to the Home by Commander Booth-Tucker. Already fully seven hundred trees and shrubs are doing well upon the place. Our boys are brimful of farming. Our chickens we hope to make a considerable source of income to the Home; the boys find immense interest in the poultry yard, and are learned in "Dominicks, Leghorns, and Black Spanish." Many of the babies are adopted yearly, and go from us into carefully selected homes, where good moral training as well as affection is assured to them. We look with thankful hearts upon our happy family of fifty boys and girls. As we see the moral and physical transformation going on around us, we think of the time now close at hand, when we shall be able by God's grace, to send these boys and girls out to the great, busy world, fitted to earn their livelihood by honest toil, and filled with a desire to brighten the lives of all around them. MRS. COL. MILES.

A GREAT IMMIGRATION YEAR

UP to the present time, the year 1903 has eclipsed all its predecessors in the multitude of its immigrants. January and February were moderately heavy months, but March broke all records for the same month in previous years, with 91,000 immigrants, or 14,178 more than in March, 1902. April's record is considerably larger. On April 10 there arrived in New York harbor 12,226 immigrants, the largest number ever recorded on a single day. Even this figure promises to be eclipsed more than once during the coming summer. If the present ratio is maintained, the population of the United States, our Washington statisticians assert, will be increased by over a million within the year.

It would be difficult to find any place more picturesquely interesting at the present time than Ellis Island, the immigration station in New York harbor. There the new arrivals are received, registered, examined, and either detained or forwarded to their ultimate destination. Our photographer, in the series of illustrations on the cover page of the present issue, has shown some very interesting and characteristic scenes. Among the aliens are Germans, Russians, Italians, Poles, Swedes, Norwegians, Finns, Slavs, British and Asiatics, the Italians, Scandinavians and Slavs predominating. Norway is sending to this country an unusually large immigration, 30,000, chiefly of the artisan class, having arrived here last year. Finland will send anywhere from 50,000 to 75,000. Many of the Finns will go to Washington, Oregon, Michigan and Minnesota. Italy, however, still furnishes the greatest number of the new arrivals, with Austro-Hungary and Russia second and third on the list.

Within a very short time after their arrival, the great body of immigrants is dispersed. While the majority go West, very large numbers remain in the Eastern cities, especially the Hebrews and Italians, most of whom go to augment the vast population on the East Side of New York.

The Uses of Wealth

IT is a cheering sign of the growing Christian spirit of the age in which we are living, that the rich are beginning to recognize the moral obligation to employ their possessions to good purpose.

During Christ's earthly ministry, He frequently spoke to his disciples and to the multitudes, concerning the right uses of riches. For those possessed of wealth, but who, instead of employing it righteously, applied it to their own selfish purposes, He had only merited denunciation. On the other hand, for the generous and liberal-hearted; for those who not only sympathized with the unfortunate, but who freely gave of their abundance to mitigate hardship and suffering; for the compassionate Samaritan, the open-handed neighbor, He had words of commendation. He taught that "a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth"—that it was the right use of those possessions alone that sanctified their ownership and converted them into blessing. In the parable of "the rich fool," in Luke, we have a most eloquent illustration of the selfish misuse of wealth, and its influence in hardening the heart, filling it with a vain self-sufficiency, and shutting out God.

In these days of great individual fortunes, it is a notable thing that an increasingly large proportion of the rich are beginning to realize the truth that, after all, their possessions alone are incapable of conferring either happiness or satisfaction. They have discovered by observation and experience, that the mere piling up of millions is vanity and vexation—an endless, futile task, at the close of which there is no gleam of hope or reward. And the truth has dawned upon them that there is a wide difference between the ownership of bonds, stocks and mortgages, and being "rich toward God." Last year, nearly four hundred of the wealthiest men in the United States gave more than $94,000,000 to charity, philanthropy and education. This is exclusive of the recent endowments by Rockefeller, Frick, and Armour, and of the $21,000,000 Thankoffering raised by the Methodist Church. The $94,000,000 included homes for the poor, for the incurable, the crippled, the aged, the blind, and help for the "submerged millions" of the tenements. In almost every instance, it would seem to be indisputable that the motive was purely one of sympathy for the needy and afflicted, and a deep compassion for the great multitude of the unfortunate, who had been side-tracked or stranded in the struggle for existence.

To the humble wage-earner, these vast benefactions may seem, by their very greatness, to overshadow the modest gift he is able to spare from his meagre means, in answer to the call to aid human suffering. But the gifts of the poor can never be overshadowed by the alms of the opulent. The widow's mite, in the Saviour's estimation, was greater than all the other contributions. Our friends who have pinched and economized and denied themselves oft, to help the distressed at home and abroad these many years, have shown an example of benevolence to the whole world. It is to the influence of this phalanx of generous souls, inspired by Christian love and sympathy, that we now owe, in a great measure, the sudden increase of benevolence among the rich. The lesson of their Christ-like work has not been without its influence. In laying up for themselves "treasures in heaven," they have unconsciously led others to emulate their example. Let us hope that the object-lesson they have given in benevolence may strike deeper still.

God's "Not Yet"

DR. MACLAREN calls attention to the frequency with which during our Lord's life on earth that expression was on his lips—"the hour," "my hour," as implying clearly that every act of his was regulated by the conviction that the time appointed for it had arrived. Friends tried to hurry him, but he would not be hurried. He waited for his hour to strike, and until that was heard, nothing could induce him to act. And he made no mistake. Those who trusted him learned then, and all who have trusted him since have learned that his hour is always best. God's clock does not go at the same rate as ours. A thousand years may sometimes be crowded into one of his days, or one of his days may be lengthened to a slow thousand years. The considerations which determined his hour are beyond our sight; but this we know, that whatever holds back his hand, it is not lack of sympathy with our sorrow; it is not disregard for our confidence; it is not unwillingness or inability to respond to our cry. All delay is the result of his love, and is meant for highest good.

How beautifully Ruskin has clothed the thought: "There is no music in a rest, but there is the making of music in it. How does the musician read the rest? See him beat the time with unvarying count, and catch up the next note true and steady, as if no breaking place had come in between. Not without design does God write the music of our lives. Be it ours to learn the time, and not be dismayed at the rests. If we look up, God himself will beat the time for us. With the eye on him, we shall strike the next note full and clear. If we say sadly to ourselves, 'There is no music in a rest,' let us not forget there is the making of music in it."

So let us wait God's good time with no drooping faith, never doubting that his delays and our sorrows are the fruits of his love, and the preparation for larger blessings and deeper joy. The Lord's "not yet," may darken to-day, but it ensures a bright to-morrow.

The Congested Ghetto

ONE of the most serious and perplexing of the problems involved by the enormous flood of immigration, described and illustrated on other pages, was discussed at a meeting held in New York a few days ago. Men, whose position enables them to know the facts, said that in the square mile of the city south of Houston street and east of the Bowery, there are now not less than three hundred thousand Jews, and that many more are on their way to our shores, who will inevitably gravitate to the same congested district. The reason for this is that Jewish immigrants do not understand the English language, and must go among people with whom they can converse, and who can be of use to them in helping them to make their way here. Ultimately, the problem will solve itself, for the Jew has the faculty of adapting himself to his surroundings, and, as he prospers, will move to better districts, as many others of his race have done. But the present crisis is serious, and is becoming more acute every day.

That the problem is presented to us for solution is due to the fact that other nations have solved it in a rough and cruel way. The East Side of New York is congested because eastern Europe has driven the Jews out by legislation, and by all kinds of social oppression. The prophecies of the Bible have been fulfilled with a stern and relentless hand. Wherever the Jews have settled in other lands than our own, they have been oppressed. They are coming here for refuge, and for that equality and fair treatment which have been denied to them elsewhere. Surely, in the land consecrated by the pilgrims of the Mayflower they ought to find such a refuge.

There are grounds for encouragement on our side as well as on theirs, for an intelligent and kindly effort to solve the problem. We have already assimilated huge populations without detriment to our institutions, and there is no reason to doubt that our power is still vigorous. Besides, in the Hebrew race there are elements which directly encourage such efforts. There is no race that requires so little help; no race so industrious and thrifty; none so quick to appreciate and seize the advantages of our social life. The fact that in all our poor-houses there are to-day only seventeen inmates of the Jewish race, is strong testimony to the independence and self-reliance of this people. They of all races are least likely to add to the public burden.

The greatest obstacle to assimilation, of course, is that of religion. While he retains his religion, the Jew ostracizes himself. But that very tenacity of faith is a commendable feature in his character. There are all too many among our non-Jewish citizens, who would abandon any religion that was an obstacle to their prosperity. We honor men who will suffer and die for their faith. And the Jewish faith has the strongest of all claims on Christian kindness. The Saviour, by whose name we call ourselves, was of Jewish race, and it is to the Jews almost exclusively that we owe the Book to which we go for guidance and consolation. They have, therefore, peculiar claims on the gratitude and hospitality of a Christian people. Who can tell whether this huge influx of Jews is not divinely arranged for Christian service? The Jew, harassed and oppressed in the name of Christ in the lands from which he comes, has learned to hate the hallowed name with intensified scorn. Be it ours to show him by kindness and helpfulness what Christianity really is. Men who go so far with us in our religious principles, worshiping the same God and holding in reverence the same literature, have already the basis for a common faith.

It is only a few days since Christian ministers gathered around the bier of a Jewish Rabbi, whom they all revered and honored. Of him, one of them said, "We called him a Christian Rabbi, but he replied, in the words of Nathan, the Wise: 'What makes of me a Christian in your eyes, makes you a Jew in mine.'" So near do good men of every faith draw to one another. If the Jew finds in every Christian community in our broad land, to which he may go, the spirit of neighborliness and helpfulness, his views of Christianity may change, and without any effort to proselyte, the Christian may win him to the faith of the Gospel.

A Winter's Work at The Bowery Mission

DURING the past winter, spiritual and rescue work of the Bowery Mission has been prosecuted with undiminished earnestness. The Gospel meetings have been carried on amid an ever-increasing interest, and blessed results have been obtained nightly.

Inroads are being effected on the inveterate indifference and stubborn prejudice of the vast multitude of men who live in the lodging-houses of the Bowery, and who may be considered the permanent element in the population of that unique thoroughfare. The Bowery Mission has always contained, in its evening congregations, a large proportion of strangers, wanderers with no home, outcast tramps, who have been allured by its bright lights, its music, and its warm welcome. But the sixty thousand men who nightly "doss" in the bunks of the lodging-houses, including many men who are regular wage-earners, and who, therefore, have a strong aversion to associating with the tramps, have long been the despair of church and mission alike.

Now, however, from end to end of the Bowery, there is not a lodging-house where every day, the Bowery Mission and its doings are not discussed. This awakened interest has had several causes, not the least of which has been the presence and addresses of several of the ablest of New York city ministers. When the names of these devoted men are recounted, it will be seen that the whole course of winter's meetings have been of a very special character. The prominence of such men as Drs. R. S. MacArthur, P. S. Henson, and Robt. Bagnell, could not fail to strike the Bowery mind, and it was clearly regarded as something extraordinary that they should all visit the mission the same week. When, in the following week, the Rev. James H. Darlington, D.D., of Christ's Episcopal Church, Brooklyn, came, and delivered one of the most powerful addresses ever heard in the Mission, a wonderful impression was made, and one of the most remarkable conversions took place that the mission has witnessed. A venerable man, shattered by drink, surrendered publicly, and has become since one of the most respected of the workers. Every night, indeed, without exception, "brands from the burning" have been gloriously saved. The warmest thanks of all friends of the mission should be accorded to the foregoing, and to the following ministers, who have assisted in the proclamation of "the sweet old story" of Christ and his love:

Rev. F. M. North, D.D.,
Rev. J. H. Elliott, D.D.,
Rev. L. W. Batten, Ph.D.,
Rev. Walter E. Bentley,
Rev. H. M. Warren, D.D.,
Rev. M. S. Littlefield, D.D.,
Rev. J. B. Devins, D.D.,
Rev. F. B. Richards,
Rev. W. C. Stinson, D.D.,
Rev. A. P. Atterbury, D.D.,
Rev. Stephen Merritt,
Rev. W. T. Elsing,
Rev. A. Mangano,
Rev. D. J. Burrell, D.D.,
Rev. Donald Sage Mackay, D.D.
Rev. W. R. Huntington, D.D.,
Rev. J. L. Campbell, D.D.,
Rev. Percy Stickney Grant,
Rev. A. H. Evans, D.D.,
Rev. H. A. Johnston, D.D.,
Rev. A. M. H. Hodder, D.D.,
Rev. E. S. Holloway, D.D.,
Rev. C. B. Chapin, D.D.,
Rev. R. Hartley,
Rev. C. D. Case, D.D.,
Rev. E. A. Dent, D.D.,
Rev. C. J. Keevil,
Rev. Geo. S. Avery,
Rev. George Sanderson, Chaplain of Sing Sing Prison.

Mention should also be made of a splendid address delivered by the Rev. Charles Inglis, the famous English evangelist, on the evening previous to his departure from this country, and also of an address of great beauty and power from Dr. O. S. Marden, the editor of Success.

The crowds of men that attend the Mission never forget their obligations to the generous readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. A year ago, many readers responded cheerfully and promptly to the appeal for subscriptions of "a dollar and no more." It is simply impossible to estimate the far-reaching results of the help thus rendered to the work of the Mission. These wanderers come from every city and State and country. At this season, any aid extended to the Mission by readers who are interested in its work would be specially welcome. All contributions will be acknowledged in these columns.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

The Oldest History

ONE of the most remarkable discoveries yet made, in connection with the history of Egypt, has just come to light. Prof. Flinders Petrie, in an article in the Sphere, relates the circumstances which have astonished the historical world. It appears that for thirty years past, a stone, covered with inscriptions on both sides, has been lying unnoticed in the museum of Palermo. A German professor, who happened to visit the museum recently, saw the stone and made a careful copy of it, which he submitted to Dr. Shafer and two other learned Egyptologists, in Berlin. They saw at once the importance of the inscriptions, and have now deciphered the whole. The stone proves to be part of a large tabulated historical record of a date far older than any hitherto found. It gives a long list of kings, and then, in separate compartments, a record, year by year, of important events. Each year is characterized by some achievement which made it memorable, and to this is added in each compartment, the height attained by the Nile in that year. Thus, one inscription is: "The year of the smiting of the Anu. Nile four cubits one span." Another reads: "Year of draining the lakes on the west, north, and east by all the people. Nile three cubits one span." The first record on the stone is about the year 4,700 B.C., but evidently the upper portion of the stone, which is missing, contained earlier records even than this. It is believed that the entire stone contained records of fully a thousand years. Some of the events thus recorded strangely confirm the statements of the Greek historians of Egypt, which the learned world has for a long time believed to be mythical, and altogether unreliable. Similar opinions have been uttered by learned men about the historical parts of the Bible. It would not be surprising if some of the many explorers now at work in Bible lands should find similar evidence to confute the scoffers, and so the promise be fulfilled:

Truth shall spring out of the earth (Psalm 85: 11).

Russia in Manchuria

Our Government is deeply concerned in the news recently received from China. In the Boxer troubles, three years ago, President McKinley earned China's profound gratitude by the determined stand which he made against the dismemberment of the country. There was danger at one stage of the negotiations, of the European powers seizing large portions of territory, while Japan would naturally claim a share. It was supposed that the danger had been avoided. Russia, however, had sent a large force into Manchuria, an extensive region in the northeast of China, adjoining Siberia. The ostensible reason for occupying the district was, that armed bands of Manchurians had passed over the border into Siberia and committed depredations. After the settlement with China, the Russians remained in the province, but gave an explicit promise to withdraw as soon as order was restored. Russia has now stated the conditions on which alone she will withdraw. She requires China to close all Manchurian ports against foreign trade, to employ no foreigners except Russians in the public service, to deposit all customs receipts in Russian banks, and to give Russia absolute control of all telegraph lines in Manchuria. China is naturally averse to granting these concessions which would practically give the province to Russia, but is aware that without foreign help she cannot resist her powerful neighbor. She has turned to our Government, as the one which befriended her in her former trouble, hoping that through our mediation she may be saved from this wholesale spoliation. Inasmuch as Russia made clear and definite promises to our Government, which these demands on China openly violate, we have the right to protest, and to insist that the Czar shall fulfil his engagements, and not take advantage of the weakness of a neighbor.

Woe to thee that spoilest, and thou wast not spoiled; and dealest treacherously, and they dealt not treacherously with thee! (Isa. 33: 1).

The Fading Document

A press dispatch from Washington, D. C., says that the Declaration of Independence is to be seen no more by the public. An order has been issued that henceforth the historic manuscript shall be kept under lock and key, in a great fire and light-proof safe. The Declaration will never be exhibited again at any of the great international fairs. This decision was reached as the result of an examination of the document by a committee of the American Academy of Sciences, now in session in Washington, who acted at the instance of Secretary Hay, whose attention has been called to the sad state of the famous document by Andrew Allen, librarian of the State Department. Most of the text of the Declaration is still legible, but only one or two of the signatures can be made out. There is only a trace of the autograph of John Hancock, the first to sign. The Government does well to take measures for the preservation of the famous document, which is one of our most precious relics; but even if it did unhappily perish, no practical harm would result to our institutions so long as its principles are established in our hearts. It is thus that God would have his Word enshrined.

I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts (Jer. 31: 33).

An Abortive Will

Many legatees are disappointed by a revelation just made by the executors of a man who died recently in a hotel in New York. He had made his home in the hotel for several years and had spent money freely. He claimed to be a count, and frequently spoke of his estates in Germany as being very extensive, and of a large property which he would inherit on the death of his father. He had many friends and went a great deal into society. When he was taken ill, he sent for a lawyer and gave instructions for his will. He left various legacies, varying from $25,000 to $5,000, to friends in New York. The property, after paying these legacies, was to be divided into two parts. One of these, consisting of $30,000, was to be placed in the hands of trustees and the income to be paid to a lady to whom he had been engaged to be married, and she was to have the right to dispose of the principal in her will. The other portion was also to be in the hands of trustees, who were to invest it for the benefit of relatives in Germany, in proportions carefully specified. After the man's death, the executors made a search for the property, but in vain. They traced his history, and found that he had always been a poor man. His sole possession had been a little cottage formerly owned by his father, which had been sold long ago. He had been a sailor, and the money he had spent in New York was the savings of his various voyages. A few pawn-tickets, his watch and clothes, worth about fifty dollars, was all the property he had to leave, and against that were debts of ten times the amount. It is difficult to understand what could have been the man's motive in making a will of this kind, when he had nothing to bequeath. It is a sad disappointment to some of the legatees, some of whom had already begun to make arrangements for the enjoyment of their legacies. It is sad to think how many people there are who, at the last, will discover that the tempter has similarly deceived them.

THE EGYPTIAN STONE FOUND AT PALERMO

While they promise them liberty, they themselves are servants of corruption (II. Peter 2: 19).

A Voluntary Hostage

The sergeant in charge of a Police station-house in Atlanta, Ga., was astonished, a few days ago, by an offer from a little boy to become a prisoner. The boy, who said he was seven years old, entered the station house and asked the sergeant if he had found his papa. "Papa gets lost sometimes," he explained, "and I've time to found him." The sergeant asked the papa's name, and referring to the blotter, found that a prisoner of that name was then in the cells on a charge of being drunk and disorderly. He had gone into a saloon with his week's wages in his pocket, and had been turned out intoxicated and penniless when the saloon closed. The boy was told that his father was there, and he said he would take him home. The sergeant replied that the man could not be released without the payment of five dollars fine. The child was much distressed by the news, for, he said, he had no money in his bank, as his papa had borrowed it. "I want him to go home," he added, "for mamma has been crying all night and she won't stop crying till he comes home." His eyes began to fill and there was a sob in his voice. He brightened, however, as he said, "I'll tell you what you can do, you can have me instead. I'll stay in papa's place till he brings you the money. Then he can go home and mamma will stop crying." The sergeant could not trust himself to speak, for the child's sob seemed to have got into his own throat. He went into the captain's room and explained the situation. When he returned he had the prisoner with him. The child sprang to his arms and kissed him. Then he resigned himself to the police, but was delighted when the sergeant told him he might go with his father. Perhaps nothing can redeem such a man from his curse, but if anything can, it would not be punishment, or denunciation, but such love as his child displayed, in offering to be imprisoned in his stead. It is such love that Christ showed in his death.

Christ hath suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God (I. Peter 3: 18).

PORTION OF THE YEARLY RECORD ON THE PALERMO STONE

BRIEF NOTES

Lady Henry Somerset has announced that, owing to ill-health, she cannot be elected President of the British Women's Temperance Association this year.

Forty-three pastors in Finland have simultaneously been deprived of their livings, because they refused to cooperate in carrying out the new Russian military service law.

A call has been issued by 2,834 clergymen, asking that the clergymen of the country recognize in suitable ways on May 25 the centenary of Ralph Waldo Emerson's birth. May 25, 1803.

Rev. Arthur Lloyd, of Tokio, Japan, who expressed the hope that the Protestant Episcopal Church would yet be represented in the Roman Catholic Church, has been called to account by his Bishop, and has resigned.

We regret to hear of the sudden death of Dr. Francis A. Horton, of the Temple Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia. He was stricken down by apoplexy while preaching on April 19, and died without recovering consciousness.

Another symptom of social reform in India is seen in the re-marriage of a widow of Bombay caste at Jeypur, Dec. 19. The bride had been a widow since her tenth year. The bridegroom, a man of education and a pleader, was twenty-two years old.

The death of Dr. Clarence E. Hartman, Field Secretary of the Christian Endeavor Society, is a severe loss to the Society, and will be deeply deplored in many lands. His bright, cheerful, genial spirit made him a welcome visitor everywhere.

M. Witte, the distinguished Russian Minister of Finance, is an ardent temperance worker. He is himself a total abstainer and has induced the Czar to decorate the men and women in his employ who have distinguished themselves in temperance work. He makes no secret of his preference for teetotalers in the various offices of the department he controls.

In its annual estimate of "the nation's drink bill," The Anniversary Cyclopedia puts the total for last at $1,300,000,000. This, however, includes an expenditure of $147,000,000 for tobacco, so the correct amount, leaving $1,152,000,000 for alcoholic beverages of all kinds and purposes. Since 1880, it says, the use of alcoholic beverages has nearly doubled, having increased from 1.04 gallons per capita to 19.48 gallons, an increase of over ninety-three per cent.

Miss Jane Addams, of Hull House, Chicago, charges the increase of typhoid to neglect on the part of the Health Department. The eighteenth ward, in which Hull House is situated, has been suffering from an epidemic of typhoid. Miss Addams has been in conference with Hull House people and physicians, and they have found that the health officers have been warned again and again, but no improvement.

Plans are being perfected for the conduct of the Student Summer Conferences of Young Men's Christian Associations of Canada and the East to be held at Lake Geneva, Wis., from June 5 to July 5. This conference will be under the supervision of Mr. D. L. Moody, as usual, and many Bible teachers will be present. Increasing attendance. Last year more than 1,000 students and teachers from the United States and Canada were present at the Northfield Conference. This is one of the Summer Conferences which are held under the auspices of the Student Department of the International Committee of Young Men's Christian Associations in different sections of the country.

A WORD TO WOMEN

NOT long ago, a lady who had just won a case involving a goodly sum of money, about twenty thousand dollars, in fact, found herself in the mortifying position of having sworn falsely. She was perfectly innocent in the matter, as everybody knew. Nevertheless, the Court reversed its decision within the hour, and the other side gained their point and kept the money, because, confronted with her own signature, the lady acknowledged it, although she had positively affirmed and sworn that she had never affixed it to the document in question. The explanation was this: The lady is now a widow, and must attend personally to her business affairs. During her husband's lifetime, he managed affairs as men usually do, no doubt very wisely, but when papers were to be signed, he told his wife where to write her name, and she obeyed, without in the least knowing to what she was pledging herself.

Women are not much to blame for being ignorant of business forms. Nor are they wrong in putting trust in their masculine nearest of kin. The mistake they too often make is in carrying their trust and their childish ignorance so far, that they become legally responsible for transactions which may cause them future embarrassment, or of which their sober judgment once awakened, would not approve.

Always read what you are requested to sign. Any sort of contract, lease, or agreement which is made in writing, and which requires a signature, is of sufficient importance to be carefully considered. If you do not understand its terms, ask for information and enlightenment. It frequently happens in the transfer of property, that the names of both husband and wife are needed, and a confiding wife called from her sewing or her ironing to add her name, does as she is bidden, heedless not only of her own interests, but perhaps of her children's. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, it may be right, but the exceptional hundredth case may be all wrong. Simply, dear women, be guided. Take the precaution to read before you sign. Do not forget that your signature stands for yourself, and should not be heedlessly set upon anything under heaven.

A VISIT FROM THE PASTOR

Now Jeames and Dick and little Tot,
Behave yo'sef, the preacher's hyar.

We gib him jes' de bes' we've got,
Dis yer's de bes' day ob de year!

A Mooted Point

They who adore dogs, and they who cannot endure them, are always at variance about that dread malady, rabies. Some physicians stoutly maintain that real hydrophobia, that terrible sequence of the bite of a mad dog, does not exist. Yet the Pasteur Institute is crowded with people who seek to be exempted from danger, after having been wounded by the teeth of a pet or a stray animal. The truth is, that whether or not the disease be hydrophobia, there is a fearful nervous disorder which attacks its victim subtly, and ends in death after frightful spasms and infinite torture, and that this malady follows on the heels of a wound which has poisoned the blood—the wound made by a dog or a cat suffering from rabies. This should not lead to wholesale destruction, to any sort of extermination or cruelty toward dogs. But dogs should be carefully protected from danger, from the attacks of vagrant curs which have been driven to madness by neglect and suffering. All such vagrants, if a home cannot be found for them, should be mercifully put to sleep, or painlessly killed. One's own dogs should be well-fed, well sheltered, kept clean, and afforded opportunity to drink when they are thirsty. During summer, drinking basins should be kept in public places and by the roadside for horses, dogs, cats, goats and birds. Dumb creatures that are our friends and dependents often suffer wofully from thirst. This should not be allowed. If one of us is bitten by any animal, have the wound at once cauterized, and do not for an instant take into the mind the thought, even as a remote possibility, that any harm will come to you. Probably, nothing will happen. Whatever else you do, never go clamoring for the immediate killing of the poor dog that did the deed, accidentally or on purpose. The dog's life should be preserved with the utmost care, until it is ascertained whether or not he is in health. If any animal is suffering, send for a veterinary surgeon, just as you would send for your doctor were a child of the house ill.

Taking Cold

The common experience called taking cold is so very familiar, that people think very little about it, and yet few things are more dangerous.

A sudden chill when one is very warm, a surfeit of indigestible food, a draught on the back of one's neck, damp clothing in which one sits, and exhaustion from over-fatigue, are among prolific causes of cold.

When one is aware by some creeping chill down the spine or round the ankles, or some burning sensation in the throat, or sharp clutch at the lungs, that he or she has taken cold, send at once for the doctor. An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. If miles away from a doctor, take a hot drink, bathe the feet in hot water, go to bed, under heaps of blankets, and stay there for a whole day. Heroic treatment, but it will rout most colds.

A Delicate Question

A CORRESPONDENT sends the following question, one by no means easy to answer:

Should a woman inform the man who wishes to marry her, of any wrong which she may have done in the past and of which she has repented? Would it not be better for him to remain in ignorance of the facts, which may cause him to distrust her, providing she feels that she can be trusted in the future?

Nothing implies or requires such absolute confidence as marriage. To begin it with a secret in reserve is seldom safe, and never wholly honorable. Both parties should enter wedlock with a clean record if possible. If not, there should be nothing concealed on either side.

The exception to this rule is as follows: If a confession or admission or revelation will inevitably traduce and perhaps ruin another and third person, it is better to be silent. The nobler way in this case would be not to marry. If one does marry, holding back some unfortunate error of the past, one must resolve upon a ceaseless silence, and this would be better than to bring scandal on or cause trouble to another.

A woman is somewhat less likely than a man to have anything in her past, on which she wishes to drop oblivion's veil. If she should confess, so should he. But in this world, the harder measure is meted to the feminine culprit. A good example of this is seen in Thomas Hardy's novel, Tess of the D'Urbervilles, in the chapter entitled "The Woman Pays." Alas! the woman always pays, pays terribly at the best of times, in the loss of her purity, of her self-respect, of her happy innocence. Also of the two transgressors, the depravity of the woman is less excusable than that of the man, because even more directly than does sin on his part, sin on her's strikes at the integrity of the family.

On the whole, a woman in such case as our correspondent suggests, must make her own decision. A chivalrous man who loves a woman will never suspect or question her.

It may happen that in the very ignorance of youth, some dreadful thing may have befallen a girl for which she was not wholly responsible. Or, a morbid conscience, oversensitive in its repentance, may magnify some trifle into a crime. Here, silence is golden.

A young woman may usually safely ask and act upon her mother's counsel in every crisis of her life.

If a man, having been generous enough to accept and condone a previous wrong committed by a woman he loves, ever taunts her with it in later life, he proves himself unworthy.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

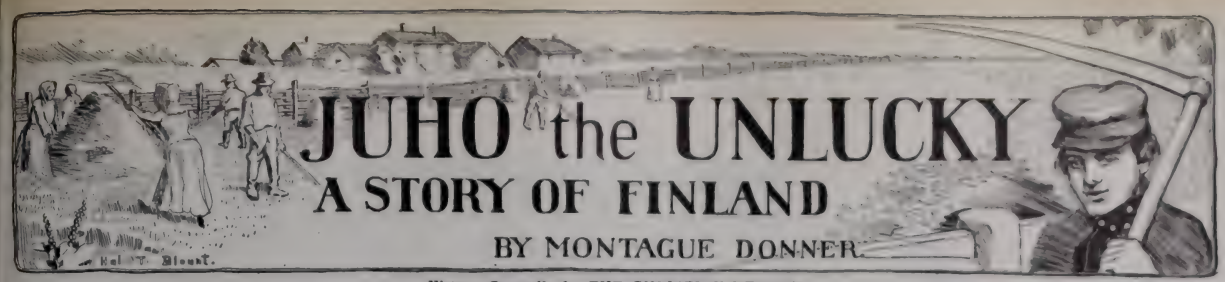
—EMILY JEAN. Beware of a critical spirit. Fault-finders are never loved.

—JACK. Unless absolutely prevented by business or trains, be at home in time for dinner.

—LULU. Pet names are reserved for the family circle. To the public present your full name.

—MARY ANNE. A man is impertinent who addresses a young lady by her Christian name without prefixing "Miss," while he is still almost a stranger to her and her family.

—FARMER'S WIFE. I appreciate your letter. Of course you are in no need of pity, and have many advantages city women lack. You don't have to crowd yourself and your children into a flat. You have closets, a cellar, an attic and a garden. I think you are to be envied.



JUHO the UNLUCKY
A STORY OF FINLAND

BY MONTAGUE DONNER

Written Specially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

I.

IN a remote parish in the eastern section of the Finnish province of Ostrobothnia, known as Karelia, a small group of men and women emerged, one early July morning, from the dark doorway of a farmhouse that fronted the south, flanked by five or six much smaller outhouses. It stood in the midst of a clearing of some eighty or ninety acres. No other human habitation was within twenty miles, save a "torpare's" cabin, a mile down the road. Dense forest surrounded the fields on three sides, and a broad, rapid stream, flowing westward, skirted the fourth.

A PEASANT GIRL

A narrow road, just broad enough to allow of the cautious passing of two vehicles, led from the farm straight through the fields down to the water's edge, where it turned off along the river to the east as far as the woods. Here the stream took a sudden turn southward, while the road plunged straight through the forest for a couple of miles, where it once more met the river, which had made another abrupt curve northward, and now proceeded side by side with the road, on its course due east, till it crossed the Russian frontier fifty-five miles away. Westward from the farm, the stream ran on for ten miles more, when it suddenly swerved to the south, to fall at the "kyrkoby" or village of Pulijarvi, into the most easterly of a chain of lakes.

The men of the party carried spades and pick-axes, grappling-irons and chains. They made their way through the rain-sodden fields of sorry-looking barley and oats, that were not only green, but barely half-grown, and which showed marshy patches where the grain had barely risen. They proceeded straight down to the river, and turned to the left along the water's edge. As they gazed over the unpromising crop, their countenances wore an expression that intensified the customary stolidity of the features of the Finnish peasantry. The owner of the farm, Matti Luhtanen—a member of the "bonde" class, a big, sturdy man of some forty years—trudged along at the head of the party stolidly indifferent, and only occasionally turning his head to address some brief remark to his companion, Lippo Wanhala, a frailer-looking man, some five years his senior.

"It looks like a mighty sorry harvest for us this year," he said gloomily, as his gaze roamed over his sodden acres. "The sickle may even grow rusty waiting for it unless old Ukko[1] will draw off these everlasting clouds at last."

"Well, it does seem as if good Dame Suvetar[2] had been frightened away by him this year," replied the other, falling in with his landlord's taste for mythological allusion.

"I'm afraid we're going to have lots of trouble with our tar-burning this season," went on Luhtanen, "we've got a good high bit of ground, but the trees are pretty well soaked, and it'll take an age to get them to ignite properly, and many a weary day and night of watching to keep the turf roof in shape."

"Maybe Tapio[3] will be kinder to us this month," was all his companion vouchsafed, believing his words, however, with a sceptical grunt that had grown habitual with him.

Lippo Wanhala's somewhat pinched face was entirely lacking in the expression of sturdy independence and self-reliance that marked the features of Luhtanen, as it does those of nearly every Finnish "bonde," accustomed to be lord of his own little domain, even while owing and cheerfully paying respect to the nobility and clergy, hearty and unwavering allegiance to his Creator and the constitutional government of his forefathers. And had not Matti Luhtanen in particular additional cause to be proud, seeing that he was the father of a couple of strapping sons and two daughters, each comelier than the average peasant maid of Karelia? Even now, the few gleams of good humor that lighted up his passive face were occasioned by the voice of his daughter Karin, as she turned now and then to banter Juho Wanhala, who, with his elder brother Antero, brought up the rear.

The Wanhalas formerly had a cabin of their own, but a year ago it had burned down, and, lacking the means to build again, they had become "inhysningar" in the home of Luhtanen, giving their labor in return for a roof and food. All had accepted the change philosophically save Juho, who was moody and dissatisfied. As the party proceeded along the bank of the river eastward, he contrived to fall further behind with his brother, partly to unload his mind, partly to escape the banter of Karin Luhtanen, which increased as Juho's face grew more and more sullen under it.

"Look here, Antero, I tell you I can't stand it any longer," he exclaimed, as a burst of laughter from the girl greeted a rather surly answer of his to one of her sallies, and called forth, even on the faces of the farm hands, smiles, that, to his distempered imagination, seemed to be secret sneers. "Just because I am an 'inhysning' of her father, the girl thinks she can make what sport of me she pleases."

"Tut, tut, Juho!" answered his brother, a stalwart young man of thirty, "I don't believe Karin has any wish to hurt you. On the contrary—"

"Then why does she always keep laughing at me?"

"Well, I suppose it's because a girl is naturally fond of teasing, especially when she finds it easy to hit the mark hard. As a matter of fact, I'm inclined to think she's really a bit fond of you."

Juho gave a hard little laugh, accompanied by a scornful shrug of the shoulders, while Antero continued:

"And then, she's not the only one; but I notice you don't seem to mind it so much when Minna is the sinner—"

"Oh! that's different," burst in Juho, while a faint flush showed itself on his face.

Antero glanced at his brother, smiled, and shrugged his shoulders in his turn.

"Minna is a girl of another stamp," continued Juho, hurriedly linking his arm in that of his brother and slowing his steps, so that the two fell still further behind. He lowered his voice as he went on. "There's no malice in her, although she calls me Juho the Unlucky, and I don't mind her poking a little fun at me now and then—she does it so gently."

He looked at his brother, who remained silent.

"Why don't you say something?" with a touch of peevishness.

"I don't know that there is anything to say."

"Oh! that's just like you. You like to let me babble till I'm out of breath, and then you come in with one of your wise saws, just invented to save lazy men like you the trouble of telling their thoughts, or of thinking at all!"

Antero laughed softly. "Deep streams don't run dry," was his sole comment.

"There, didn't I tell you so?" exclaimed Juho, impatiently. "Always some musty old proverb. There's no talking to you, even when one has something important to say."

"Something important to say, lad?" Antero's voice took on a tender solicitude. "What is it? You have not had another dispute with Luhtanen, have you?"

THE TAR-BURNERS

Juho merely shook his head, and his brother went on:

"You know you have to be careful what you say to the old man, or he'll be turning you out some day."

"Yes, I know, hang him! He thinks it's a crime for an 'inhysning' to have a mind of his own; but I'll show him."

"Oh, come, now, Juho, Matti Luhtanen's not a bad sort of fellow at all. I think he's treated us pretty well altogether, and if you fall out with him, I fancy it will be mainly your own fault after all, with your airs. But what's the use of threshing old corn? Tell me, is it about Minna?"

"How did you know?" burst out Juho. Then, with an air of mystery, "Do you know Bengt Maijala's coming here?"

"No! I thought he was over the Russian border."

"So he was a month ago. But Paavo Saari told me yesterday morning in the forest that Bengt was in the country again. You know Paavo is just back from Mantsala, where he went to take a few loads of lumber and a couple of Lutheranite cows as they have only two or three left through the failure of the grass crop, and he says that the lad told him he was on his way to Luhtanen's and was going to stop over awhile at Luhtanen's gard on his way."

Antero looked at him in some surprise, not seeing the drift of his brother's speech much less its connection with Minna. Juho did not leave his longer long in doubt.

"Well," he went on, "you know Bengt Maijala doesn't confine himself to singing of 'Wainamoinen' and 'Ilmarinen' and the old folk myths—nobody can beat him at making up a rune on the spot. Well, I'm going to tell him just how things are with Minna and myself, and get him to put us both in a new song of his, of course without names mentioned. You know everyone looks on him as inspired, and if he makes the 'bonde's' daughter and the 'inhysning' in the song come together, I tell you I'll have Minna before long, father or no father."

"But if Maijala sees the girl doesn't care for you——"

"Who is to say she doesn't? At least, she doesn't dislike me. And then don't forget that I saved the old bard two years ago when we were out hunting, that time he fired at a lynx and missed it, and the beast was about to spring on him. Why, Maijala would do anything for me now."

"Well, I wish you luck, Juho. But there, father's calling us—let's catch up with the others; we've nearly reached the tar-burning grounds without knowing it."

II.

So deeply interested had been the brothers in their conversation, that they had not noticed when they left the high-road at the spot where it plunged into the forest, and struck into a side-path. This path followed the southern curve of the river for three-quarters of a mile, afterwards climbing a gradual slope in a southeasterly direction through the trees, until it ended in a clearing on the summit of the thickly-wooded eminence. This tract of forest land, with the road to the Russian frontier as its northern boundary and the river on its three other sides, was composed of rocky masses worn on the southern side into bays and coves by the swift waters of the curving stream. It presented an ideal spot for both the woodsman and the poet, for the lover of nature and the predatory timber-merchant.

Arrived on the broad crest of the slope, the men, with hardly a breathing space, set to work with a will digging an enormous trench, some fifty yards by ten. It had already been staked out by Luhtanen the previous day, with one end some five yards down the shoreward slope. They worked steadily, rhythmically, not needing more than an occasional encouraging word from the "bonde," throwing the soil into heaps, ranged along the sides, while the women fastened the grappling hooks to the biggest logs, and cleared away the undergrowth where it was likely to hinder the men's progress. At length, when the trench had been dug to a depth of from two to two and a-half feet at its lower end, Matti gave the signal to stop.

All around were lying, felled the previous winter, trunks of pine-trees, carefully selected for their resinous quality. They had been stripped while still standing of most of their bark, and sawed since April into lengths convenient for transportation and kept dry by tarpaulin covers, awaiting the sunny weather that never came. These huge logs were now carried, dragged, and pushed to the pool toward the trench at the bottom of which the women had a wooden trough about two inches broad and six deep, sunk in a long spout that projected about a foot over the shoreward side of the slope. This trough was stamped firmly into the ground and the logs were piled above it in the form of leaving a space on each side large enough for a man to walk up and down.

Noon arrived, and the workers rested for lunch. Some [illegible] rod and line, but [illegible] catch fish, the waters [illegible] lent. Their interval of rest at an end, the men set to work, once more, piling up the moist earth above the logs.

How the Northland Fought the Famine

SAD STORIES OF SUFFERING FROM FINLAND — THE WORST NOW OVER IN SWEDEN

GRADUALLY the details of the terrible sufferings and privations endured by the peasantry of the interior provinces of Finland, are coming to light. We give below the substance of a letter received from the Rev. J. D. Kilburn, formerly pastor of the American Church in St. Petersburg, describing conditions among the peasant farmers of Onkamo. He writes:

When I reached Sordavala, I was told that the famine had spread as far south as Johmajarvi. On telephoning to the pastor there, I found that this was but too true. He gave a worse account of things than I heard in Sordavala. Yet, even from his account I was not prepared to find things so bad as I did when I arrived in his parish. I will, in as brief a form as I can, give an account of what I saw and heard in a few of the homes which I visited in and around Onkamo, in the parish of Johmajarvi.

Home No. 1.—A small farmhouse. The family consists of six people. The only man in the house is sick. He is so weak that he appears to be unable to stand except as he leans against the table. He seems to be about seventy years of age, yet the pastor tells me he is not sixty. Want and overwork have aged and broken him. His wife is old and weak. They have had nothing to eat except bad black bread for the last three months. Even that will soon be at an end. They have very little left. There is an aged and lame woman living with them. Who is she? She is poor and crippled and has no home of her own anywhere. These people, in their deep poverty, have taken pity on her and let her share their home, and are now sharing with her their last black bread.

Home No. 2.—An exceedingly small house. Inside we found only a sick and lonely woman. She was so weak that it was difficult for her to answer the few questions we put to her. Her husband had had to leave her to go and seek work. There was no work to be found near his home. This poor woman had been ill some time, she was weak and utterly alone, yet one did not hear one word of complaint. The thought of this poor woman in her sickness and loneliness haunts me. Were it not that so many equally sad cases have crowded upon me in quick succession since then, I should hardly be able to forget her.

Home No. 3.—A small, chimneyless room with a hole in the roof to let out the smoke. It has a low door and one little window. It was difficult for me to remain more than a minute or two in this room: it was so full of smoke. Yet, as the pastor well said, some of those we meet there must live in it day and night. Inside this little house we found an aged and almost blind man and his aged wife, and a homeless and almost equally aged woman, on whom they had taken pity and whom they allowed to share their home and their nearly exhausted black bread. There was also a young man, their son, who lived with them and for them. He is their only support. He is without work now. This makes matters for them darker than ever. If not helped they must suffer and die.

Home No. 4.—Such a home I have heard of but have never seen before. It is dug out of the side of a hill. In it live a man and his wife and four children. The poor, thin, pale mother is nursing an almost naked three-months'-old baby. The father and his two little sons, of six and nine years old, are out working. All three cannot, however, earn enough to keep one. What will be the state of this poor family if not helped?

Home No. 5.—Another home dug out of the same hillside. Poor though the people were in Home No. 4, those in Home No. 5 are poorer still. The man and his wife have been sick and unable to work for nearly three months. The wife is sick still. The man may be said to be sick also, yet he has gone back to work. How have this man, his wife, and their four little children lived through this long and trying time? By one of the noblest arts of benevolence and self-denial I have ever known. A fellow workman, with a wife and six children, who is hardly earning enough for himself and family, has taken care of them. When he himself could not help them further, he got others to lend him money on whatever security he could give, so that he might lend this money to this sick and starving family. In this way he borrowed nearly £3. He does not know how they will be able to repay him, nor if they will ever be able to do it, but he has the satisfaction of knowing that he has saved this whole family from starvation and death.

FAMINE CHILDREN OF FINLAND, CARED FOR IN THE CHILDREN'S HOME AT PAOLONKA

The Famine in the Remote North

The following from Mr. Relander, describes the present situation in a remote part of Finland, which has only lately been reached by the famine relief:

Dear Dr. Klopsch:—According to promise, I will try to give you a brief sketch of conditions in the parish of Kolari, situated a short way north of 67 degrees, on the rivers of Torneo and Muonio. This parish has been much spoken of during the present year of distress. The population is 1,723 persons, and is spread over an area of 2,223 square kilometres, grouped on lakes and rivers, in small villages, containing six to twelve farms and as many crofts. In the poorest tracts of narrow space you find cleanliness everywhere.

Last autumn, when distress appeared and assistance had not yet been received, the parish fund had come to an end. The chairman of the board of guardians gave to the neediest pieces of paper, by which he requested some merchant of other well-to-do person in the parish to give to the bearer such assistance as the chairman ordered, and engaged to redeem those pieces of paper by the next raising of taxes. However, it appeared very difficult to get these parish bonds exchanged for cash or victuals. Meat must be fetched from far-off, from Torneo, a distance of nearly two hundred kilometres. Flour is bought at 26 marks per kilo. Salt, bacon and general food at famine prices. Meat is difficult to be had, even with money.

Farther north, the parish of Muonio is considerably better off; there the reindeer culture is an important source of income. In parishes situated immediately south of Kolari—chiefly in Turkola and Karunki—the crop failure has also caused severe economical disturbances, but the conditions of these parishes are on the whole better.

With thanks to you on behalf of my people, as well as myself, for the warm interest you have shown our poor country, and for your visit, which always will remain in our memory, highly appreciated, I remain,

Yours sincerely,

KONR. RELANDER.

Better News from Sweden

Cheering news comes from Sweden. In its official report of the distress in the northern provinces, the Stockholm Central Relief Committee states that the funds at its disposal are now sufficient to meet requirements, provided the growth of the pasturage is not retarded. This intelligence will be welcomed by all who have helped in the relief work, and who by their gifts have aided in saving many precious lives.
